National Endowment for the Arts
Washington, D.C. 20506

Dear Mr. President:

I have the honor to submit to you the Annual Report of the National Endowment for the Arts and the National Council on the Arts for the Fiscal Year ended September 30, 1980.

Respectfully,

Livingston L. Biddle, Jr.
Chairman

The President
The White House
Washington, D.C.

February 1981
Chairman's Statement

The Dream... The Reality

"The arts have a central, fundamental importance to our daily lives." When those phrases were presented to the Congress in 1963—the year I came to Washington to work for Senator Claiborne Pell and began preparing legislation to establish a federal arts program—they were far more rhetorical than expressive of a national feeling of reality.

They were expressive of a vision of an unprecedented but uniquely American experiment in developing cultural growth and progress. As in visions, dreams, ideas which are possible of fulfillment, there was a core of truth. But it was distantly perceived. Words like "far-fetched," "impractical," "eccentric" were applied—and even, at critical moments, ridicule.

But the vision persisted. The dreams, the ideas became part of a fledgling program enacted into law 15 years ago. And today the vision is perceived closer at hand. The arts in the United States are gaining a national significance, a new sense of priority. They are recognized for the gift of enrichment which, in such a special manner, they provide.

So on this 15th anniversary, I express my own particular admiration for those early Congressional leaders, of both parties, who in choosing a road, "took the one less traveled by," who pioneered and blazed a trail which is becoming more and more a broad avenue toward the future.

As a nation we are mobilizing funding resources—at federal, state, and local governmental levels, among corporations, foundations, and private philanthropists—on behalf of the arts and the abiding talents they represent. We are moving toward goals which once seemed impossibly beyond reach.

The enriching qualities of the arts can profoundly affect the uplifting of the human spirit. That has been true in leading civilizations throughout history. It is becoming true in our own country—at all economic levels of society. I see growing numbers of examples. It is not a renaissance of the arts. It is birth; it is a new beginning. We have never witnessed its like before.

In the 15 years since 1965, the arts have begun to flourish all across our country, as the illustrations on the accompanying pages make clear. In all of this the National Endowment serves as a vital catalyst, with states and communities, with great numbers of philanthropic sources. The agency's role, increasing in meaning year by year, is wholly in keeping with the original legislation’s design, and the ideals of my two predecessors as Endowment chairman, Roger Stevens and Nancy Hanks.

Special safeguards to ensure that government would not dominate or threaten the free development of the arts were carefully written into our basic law. Unlike most federal agencies, our staff members do not make the crucial decisions about which projects and which artists receive support. My job really is to bring together the experts in each field, to discuss the merits of our 25,000 applicants and determine those best qualified. Competition is enormous. Only one applicant in four on average, with the funding now available, is successful.

The panel system of peer review is at the core of the Arts Endowment. Extending the concept are the 26 private citizens, appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, who serve as members of the National Council on the Arts. The Council guides the agency's overall policies and reviews panel recommendations for final action.

The law also includes a firm injunction against interfering in the policies of our grantees, a provision basic to freedom of expression.

The Endowment has had some controversial moments; and yet controversy is the yeast that makes the creative loaf rise. If we tried to be forever safe in our grant-making, we would not be fostering the free expression of ideas on which the arts thrive. In fact, if you compare the Endowment's grants over the years to arts support in the private sector, you will find that the Endowment is more likely to fund the new, the sometimes experimental, the less immediately visible work—the lone composer or poet, the small press which gives opportunity to talent in literature, the off-off Broadway theater at the cutting edge of the theater arts.

In the agency's budget for the current year, we emphasize access—that is, making the best in the professional arts available to the widest number—with emphasis on television and touring. Our support for such series as Dance in America and Live from Lincoln Center demonstrates how television reaches beyond the large cities and presents major arts events to all parts of our country. It also has the special potential for educating Americans in the immense diversity of the arts.

During the last two years, for example, 34 million people have seen Metropolitan Opera performances on Live from the Met. In terms of our assistance, that works out to a cost of less than two cents a viewer. We are planning now to emphasize other art forms which have not yet appeared frequently on television—jazz, the visual arts, and the design arts such as architecture—and to support important new efforts in theater and opera.

We have discovered that television, far from undermining live performances, whets the viewer's appetite for more. After appearing on Dance in America, the Joffrey Ballet learned that 59 percent of those attending for the first time during the company's next New York season were there because they had seen the Joffrey on television. Arts audiences are not satisfied to be mere passive observers. Inevitably, new dance companies spring up in communities which have seen a great performance, whether it be on television or through touring by an excellent company.

A second important model for the long-term future of the arts is a city like Savannah, Georgia, or San Antonio, Texas, or Winston-Salem, North Carolina, where the arts are serving as the focal point, the driving force in revitalizing the city. Winston-Salem, for example, had been losing population to its suburbs. Several years ago the Arts Endowment gave a small planning grant to the local arts council to move into a deteriorating section of the center city.

From that beginning has come a coalition of cultural, political, and business leaders who are now rebuilding the downtown around a special arts enclave, including a theater, a center for the arts, a park, and artists’ studios. The combined efforts, including historic restoration and pride in the past, have stimulated $3 million in grants from other federal agencies and over $100 million in private investment.

More important in my view is that in another ten years, Winston-Salem could emulate an Athens of old, a city where the arts are indeed exemplified as of central, fundamental importance to daily life. And the same emphasis could develop across the country.

As in the story of Winston-Salem, I believe it’s legitimate to discuss the economic impact of the arts, their often proved value in attracting tourism and in rebuilding cities. We can discuss their social benefits, their values to the handicapped, the aging, or those in prisons. Art, in a special way, does furnish such benefits; and businesses, large and small, have a relevance to the arts—all the way from a photographic flashbulb to the bricks and mortar of a cultural center.

But let us stress the intangible values of the arts above all—their gifts to the eye and ear and mind, to the imagination, to the questing spirit, to the revelation of new horizons. An Appalachian folk singer of indigenous American music, a Metropolitan Opera star, a painter, poet, choreographer...all the myriad art forms, those from ethnic backgrounds, those from the deepest traditions of our Native Americans...each adds to the multifaceted riches of the arts.

For the large arts organization, and the small ones, survival remains the single most descriptive word.... But survey the road traveled in 15 years.... Then look toward mountains yet to scale.... Remember the individual artist as the surest guide.

And remember, too, that when a society emphasizes the arts, it emphasizes the value of individuality. Where the arts flourish, so does that consummate political system centered on the individual—democracy.

Livingston Biddle, Chairman
National Endowment for the Arts
The Agency and Its Functions

The National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities
In 1965, Congress created the National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities as an independent agency of the Executive Branch of the Federal Government. The Act, Public Law 89-209, was last amended by Public Law 94-462 in October 1976. The Foundation is composed of the National Endowment for the Arts, the National Endowment for the Humanities, and a coordinating council of federal officials called the Federal Council on the Arts and the Humanities. The Foundation has no administrative or programming identity separate from its components. Each of the two Endowments is served by its respective advisory body, the National Council on the Arts or the National Council on the Humanities.

Federal Council on the Arts and the Humanities
The Federal Council on the Arts and the Humanities is composed of the Chairmen of the two Endowments and 18 highly placed government officials.

The Federal Council promotes coordination between the programs of the two Endowments and those of other federal agencies which support the arts and the humanities. It also undertakes research related to these programs.

The National Council on the Arts
Formed in 1964, the National Council on the Arts preceded by one year the establishment of the National Foundation on the Arts and the Humanities.

The Council is composed of the Chairman of the National Endowment for the Arts, who serves as Chairman of the Council, and 26 presidentially appointed citizens who are recognized for their knowledge of the arts, or for their expertise or profound interest in the arts. The Council is mandated by law to advise the Chairman on policies, programs, and procedures. It also must review and make recommendations on applications for grants.

The National Endowment for the Arts
The National Endowment for the Arts is, in effect, an independent federal agency, with its own Chairman, National Council, staff, programs, and budget.

Both legislatively and by Council policy, the Arts Endowment was conceived as a catalyst to increase opportunities for artists and to spur involvement in the arts on the part of private citizens, public and private organizations, and the states and communities. The Endowment's relationship to the primarily private and local cultural community is one of partnership, in which the federal role is to respond to the needs of the field rather than direct or interfere in the creative activities of individual artists or cultural organizations.

Endowment Panels
The panels serve the individual Programs of the Endowment much as the National Council on the Arts serves the Endowment as a whole. Together the Council and panels provide a system of professional peer review to evaluate applications, identify problems, and develop the policies and programs through which the Endowment responds to changing conditions.

More than 500 private citizens serve on these panels, whose membership rotates regularly. Panelists are appointed by the Chairman with the advice of the Council and staff as well as other organizations and leaders in the field.

Methods of Funding
Grant money authorized by Congress comes to the Endowment in program funds, the Treasury Fund, and Challenge Grant funds. Most direct grants to organizations and individuals come from program funds. These grants must be matched dollar-for-dollar.

The Treasury Fund arrangement allows private donors to pledge gifts to specific Endowment grantees. Each pledge frees an equal amount for the grantee from the Treasury Fund, which is maintained at the Treasury Department. Grantees must then match the combined total of the donor's pledge and the Treasury Fund disbursement.

Challenge Grants are awarded for projects that contribute to the long-term financial stability of grantee organizations and must be matched on a three-to-one basis.

Deputy Chairman’s Statement

In the pages that follow, the reader will find descriptions of more than 5,000 grants awarded in fiscal 1980—and not a single reference to 19,000 rejected applications. For this silence about rejections there are excellent reasons. The Annual Report is concerned with what the Endowment did with its appropriated funds—not what it almost did or considered doing. Nevertheless, there is a certain irony in ignoring a subject as important as rejections—important not only because the Endowment staff spends so much time dealing with applications that have not been funded, explaining to the applicants what went wrong, defending the decisions when controversies develop, but also because an understanding of rejections sheds so much light on the way the Endowment operates. So it seems appropriate here to remedy this lacuna in the Annual Report and to discuss why some applications are chosen to be funded and some are rejected.

First, the fact that an application is not funded does not automatically mean that it has little merit. In fiscal 1980 the number of applications rose by 15.6 percent (from 20,600 in fiscal 1979 to 23,800); available funds for grants, however, rose only 3.2 percent. As a result, competition for grants was more intense than ever. All too often we found ourselves in the unhappy position of rejecting good projects that could very well have been funded.

This situation was most acute when it came to selecting fellowship winners. Competition for available fellowship money is always brisk, the odds always greatly against an applicant’s getting an award. In the spring of 1980, for example, panelists for the Visual Arts Program reviewed 5,003 applications and recommended 119 grants at $10,000 each and 197 grants at $3,000. Often I’ve suggested to the Programs that the dollar amounts of the fellowships be substantially increased. Generally, though, panels want to keep the awards at modest levels in order to give more grants to more artists, since so many are worthy.

Despite the inevitable difficulties of choosing one artist over another or one artistic project rather than another, I believe our panels’ decision-making process this year was more equitable than ever before. Fiscal 1980 was the first year in which the panels had the advantage of using the results of two activities begun earlier—increasing the number of on-site visits to applicants and broadening the composition of panels to include the widest possible range of aesthetic viewpoints. From the on-site visits, the Endowment received fresh information from the field; from the new panelists, new perspectives and new approaches to the arts.

Naturally, however, not everyone whose application is turned down by the Endowment accepts the rejection with good grace. And, of course, everyone has a right to question the rejection of his application. We try to answer the questions as specifically as possible. Notes are taken at every panel meeting, and most meetings are tape recorded. If an applicant questions a decision, we check through these records and give an accurate summary of the reasons for the application’s rejection.

Then, too, when circumstances warrant it, we do make an honest effort to reconsider applications. This year we established an appeals process, a formal method of scrutinizing how an application came to be rejected, to determine whether the procedures were completely fair. In fiscal 80 about a dozen rejections were reviewed under the appeals process; one decision was changed. The Endowment has been very careful not to allow outside pressure to alter a decision. It reverses a judgment only when it determines that the decision-making process was flawed in some way and, therefore, the application was not treated as fairly as it might have been.

Many people have suggested changes that they believe would make the application process fairer, more impartial. The most frequent suggestion is that judging should be anonymous—that is, that panelists should make their recommendations on applications without knowing the names of the applicants. In many ways, this is an appealing idea, and the Endowment has taken some steps in that direction. This year, for example, the Visual Arts Program started a system whereby panelists did not know the sex of fellowship applicants.
Judging that is ‘blind,’ or totally anonymous, however, presents real problems. There is, first of all, the logistical nightmare of keeping track of thousands of slides and manuscripts from which the names have been removed. To reduce the possibility of error, we would need a more complex record-keeping system and a larger staff to handle it—a real problem, given the constraints of the Endowment’s administrative budget. Another objection is that the system appears to work against the younger, less established artists. Panelists in both literature and visual arts believe that the work of better-known artists is immediately recognizable and that this puts the less established artists at a disadvantage. Anonymous judging also would make it impossible for the Visual Arts Program to continue its policy of awarding a small number of large grants ($12,500 for fiscal ’82) to established artists and many more smaller grants ($4,000 for fiscal ’82) to emerging artists. Without the names and information on the application forms, panelists cannot make these distinctions with certainty. Finally, panelists point out that the present system has not worked to the advantage of the well-known artist over the lesser-known.

These problems with blind judging do not mean that the Endowment has decided not to pursue the idea at all—only that it intends to pursue it cautiously and to evaluate the results to be sure any steps taken do indeed mean a gain in fairness and objectivity.

Another suggestion often heard is that all panel meetings should be open to the public. The Endowment continues to feel that open meetings put persons far from the Washington-East Coast corridor at a severe disadvantage. Open meetings have other disadvantages: By law, the National Council on the Arts must review and act upon panel recommendations; the Council may—or sometimes does—overturn panel decisions. If the panel meetings were open and word of their recommendations already out, the Council would be in a most awkward position in trying to carry out its review function. In addition, open meetings would multiply the amount of hearsay that inevitably follows a panel meeting. These bits of information, out of context and often inaccurately reported, have immense potential for creating misunderstanding. Then, too, we are concerned about protecting the reputations of the artists whose work is evaluated at panel meetings. We do not want one panel’s verdict to become common knowledge, with the potential for influencing decisions made at other times. And, finally, we want to protect the integrity of the panel process. Panelists are experts whose knowledge and understanding of the arts are essential in helping the Endowment in its central role of grant-making. When panelists gather, often at the cost of considerable personal inconvenience, they must feel free to express their honest opinions about the material before them. The Endowment always makes sure, however, that part of every panel meeting is open to the public. During this time, anyone may ask questions of the panel and staff.

We recognize, of course, that the system for awarding grants is imperfect. Doubtless, every year mistakes are made; and surely this Annual Report, like all its predecessors, lists grants that never fulfilled their promise. That’s inherent in the business of grant-making. But the system is under constant review and, we believe, getting better. Ironically, rejections play a real part in improving that system. They pressure the Endowment continually to evaluate its procedures, to remain responsive to the field, and to keep alert to the possibility and the value of change.

Mary Ann Tighe
Deputy Chairman for Programs
During much of the Dance Program's first 15 years, the needs of the dance community were immediate and obvious. By the mid-1960s the United States claimed many of the world's outstanding dance artists. Few Americans, however, knew they were here. Their appearances all too often were brief and erratic. (If you missed the Martha Graham Company's one-night stand, you might have to wait five years for the company to return to your town.) Dance artists were rarely paid for their work. And perhaps worst of all, the public did not know what to make of dance. Unlike the established worlds of the opera, the symphony, or the museum, dance in America had very quickly transformed classical traditions by kicking off its shoes and creating its own innovative styles. Of all the performing arts, dance certainly appeared to be the least understood and least accepted.

In short, the American dance scene resembled a beautiful but sketchy mosaic. The key elements of the design—the artists and their work—were in place, but the missing tiles were of a variety of shapes and sizes: money, management, audiences, and public awareness and understanding. Joining forces with the foundations, individuals, and agencies already supporting dance, the Dance Program set out to help fill in the grand design.

In the last 15 years the status of dance has changed more dramatically than that of any other art form. Audiences have grown by the tens of millions. High-quality professional dance companies of all sizes and styles tour regularly throughout this country and abroad. Professional dance artists, though still underpaid, have begun to support themselves through their art. More than the other live performing arts, dance has conquered both commercial and public television. Dance company management has become considerably more sophisticated. Finally, the public has come to embrace dance for its art, for its discipline, and for the sheer joy of watching it.

The mosaic is slowly filling in. Yet some tiles, the financial ones in particular, must be constantly refurbished. While we recognize that this basic financial support will always be fundamental to the Dance Program, in the last year it has become clear that we must look beyond the immediate funding needs of dance to larger issues—some of which may not be within the immediate bounds of our grant-making.

No one can question the overall quality of American dance; the Dance Program is now trying to improve the quality of its setting. Most dance performances still take place in high school auditoriums or gyms, lecture halls, alternative spaces, concert halls, and theaters designed for drama or opera. For years dancers have danced on hard floors and shallow stages that are too dangerous for the full range of their choreographed movement. And while dance companies are performing more than ever before, many still do not have enough performance opportunities, particularly in their own communities. The reason: Few companies have access to a home at home—a theater designed for dance and available on a regular basis.

This year the Dance Program, in collaboration with the Design Arts Program, has funded the Design Coalition to produce a publication on dance facilities. Rarely have the needs of dance—in terms of stage floors, sight lines, wing space, and dressing rooms—been considered early enough in the process of designing theaters. The results have often been beautiful spaces, ill-suited to dance. By helping dance artists explain exactly what they need to the city planners, architects, and patrons involved in a cultural facility, this publication should encourage more communities to add dance centers to their cultural landscapes.

We realize that the Dance Program will never have enough money to fund the large-scale construction or renovation of dance theaters. However, this year, again in conjunction with the Design Arts Program, we did make a pilot grant ($105,000 in a $1.5 million project) for the renovation of the Elgin Theater in New York City. More important, though, the Program acted as an advocate for the concept of the Elgin... in its efforts to secure funding from other federal agencies, such as the Commerce Department and the Department of Housing and Urban Development. In a similar way, we helped the Bella Lewitzky Dance Company convince local officials of the importance of including a medium-size dance theater as part of Los Angeles' downtown redevelopment plan. While single dance companies are developing both these projects, each is intended to serve dance companies from all over the country by providing a theater specifically designed for dance.

This kind of project is vital because a company that can appear regularly in the same dance theater establishes a more permanent relationship with its audience. Building audiences and financial support becomes much easier. We foresee that in the 1980s dance companies of all sizes and types—modern, post-modern, and ethnic as well as ballet companies, which have something of a head start in this area—will become much more aggressive in developing their local audiences and extending their home seasons.

During the 1960s and '70s, the Dance Program measured growth quantitatively. New dance companies and choreographers came into being with frightening speed. We counted touring by the number of engagements, not their length; we totaled up sponsors by how many presented dance, not by how much dance each presented.

The Dance Program feels that dance will continue to expand in the 1980s, but the relevant ways of measuring growth must be qualitative. We wish to help companies obtain longer, as well as more, engagements. We hope to help them develop ongoing ties with certain presenters in certain communities. We plan to encourage sponsors to expand their programming to include more companies and styles of dance than their audiences are accustomed to seeing. The development of solid sponsorship, however, is not a task the Dance Program can address on its own. For the past two years we have been working with the Inter-Arts Program and the state and regional arts agencies in an effort to upgrade both the quality and quantity of dance presentation.

Meanwhile, the numerical growth of new dance companies has started to level off. This does not indicate a decline in the number of professionals entering the dance field. Rather, it is a very understandable response to the economics of the '80s when fewer choreographers can take on the financial and moral responsibility of starting a company of their own. What we see instead is the emergence of more choreographers who choose to work independently and of dance collectives that share a group of performers. These artists, along with some who have their own companies, want to create works for the existing repertory dance companies. The problem at the moment lies in establishing the communication link between companies and choreographers. In our choreography applications from dance companies, we see that there are a handful of known choreographers, names in great demand. Our policy panel currently is grappling with ways to help the repertory companies learn more about other talented choreographers and to help the choreographers gauge which companies might be receptive to their work.

In some ways I believe that what we know as the "dance boom" of the last 15 years—namely, the expansion of dance performances and the consequent growth in audiences—was really a flowering of the art form before it had a chance to put down solid roots. During the 1980s we in the Dance Program expect dance to solidify its status and extend those roots in the form of longer home seasons in true dance theaters, cooperative growth efforts led by presenting organizations, a mutually beneficial connection between independent choreographers and repertory dance companies, and increasingly sophisticated dance company management.

Dance Grants

Dance Touring Program

Includes three subcategories: Small Companies grants are awarded to state or regional arts agencies which, in turn, give grants to local sponsors of dance companies eligible for touring support for engagements of at least two-and-one-half days. Large Companies grants aid groups that wish to sponsor an engagement by American Ballet Theater, New York City Ballet, or the Joffrey Ballet. Long-Term Engagements grants support sponsors engaging dance companies for two or more weeks. Such engagements often include community activities, such as classes, workshops, open rehearsals, or collaborative efforts with local arts organizations.

Design Arts

Of all the art forms supported by the National Endowment for the Arts, design is at once the most pervasive and the least acknowledged. Most pervasive in that it affects every one of us every day in the utensils we eat with, clothes we dress in, and buildings we live in. Least acknowledged in that its aesthetic value is often overshadowed by the social, economic, and utilitarian aspects that give design its peculiar place among the arts, allying it with both science and the humanities. To isolate the aesthetic component would place design strictly in the arena of the visual arts. To deal only with its utilitarian virtues would be to identify it with engineering. Thus, the activities that the Design Arts Program supports in the many fields that make up the design professions—architecture; landscape architecture; and interior, industrial, urban, fashion, and graphic design—necessarily amalgamate pragmatism with creative vision.

In 1980 the Design Arts Program completed the First Annual Grants Recognition Program to acknowledge the accomplishments of the projects Design Arts had supported in its first 15 years. We are proud that our grantees often achieved not only high artistic quality but embodied inventiveness and creativity which were often seminal in their influence on the direction of design in America. As architecture critic William Marlin put it: "The Design Arts Program of the National Endowment for the Arts, that Johnny Appleseed-style federal agency founded 15 years ago, has been a key factor in trying to help America find itself again. Sprinkling its seed-money grants across varied urban, suburban, and rural terrain, it has yielded bumper crops of professional creativity, community participation, local investment, and a renewed concern for the design of the public realm. In a period like our own, when there are also bumper crops of scarcity—energy, material resources, capital, confidence—the Design Arts Program has shown that a lot of things, including money, can grow on trees, and they can indeed bloom in places where until recently, there appeared to be only blight at the end of the tunnel."

This intensive review of past grants has led to the initiation of different categories of support for prospective applicants. There has been a shift from the use of thematic grant categories (like Livable Cities, City Options, City Edges) to categories which define the activity of design (like Design Communication, and Demonstration and Exploration) without tying them to particular topics. Through this new approach we mean to open the door to a more inclusive array of proposals and creative ideas. At the same time, the Design Arts Program has identified a set of topical concerns which we believe the design fields, their clients, and the general public should be made aware of. These areas of special concern are:

- Facilities for the Arts: Since the Endowment's founding 15 years ago, there has been an extraordinary increase in the number of organizations that present art. This growth has created an urgent need to provide well-designed facilities to house the performing arts and all of our other art forms. This need does not end with the design and construction of an individual facility, but extends to the quality of a facility's setting as well—the transportation and parking, parks and open space, restaurants, shops, and artists' housing. Properly designed settings should create lively, livable, and exciting environments for the arts. It is also important to note that, as city officials recognize the arts as a necessary part in urban revitalization, planning for the arts is becoming an important issue for urban policymakers as well as designers.

- Civic Design: The general quality of our nation's spaces, places, and buildings is not as good as it could be. The land given over to streets, sidewalks, and public buildings of all types in most urbanized areas is greater than the land under private development. (In fact, the public sector is the largest single builder in the United States.) What makes a community livable is more often a product of the total...
The design of street furniture, outdoor lighting, signage, bus shelters, paving materials, mini-parks, plazas, and public buildings, as well as the broader systems of transportation and public utilities form the collage of our public environment and give definition to our civic pride.

The question we must ask ourselves as a society is whether we will continue to treat our civic environment as a kind of “no-man’s land” or whether we are prepared to exert as much energy in the design of public spaces as we have given to our private architecture.

- Designer/Visual Artist Collaboration: In recent years, innovations like one-percent-for-art budgets have provided what seem to be wonderful opportunities for sculptors and environmental artists to create pieces for new public buildings and open spaces. But all too often the original planning does not make room for art. So the commissioned artists find themselves struggling to create works for unsuitable spaces. And the designers—architects, urban designers, landscape architects—are surprised to discover that their works are to be the settings for art in public spaces. The result is an atmosphere of antagonistic isolation between artistic disciplines. The artist sees his work as after-the-fact adornment; the architect sees his work as compromised by unanticipated art.

Obviously, we have to explore ways in which artists and designers can work together at the earliest stages of a project. Though trends suggest that the disciplines are moving together in practice and philosophy (with post-modernist architects attending to the aesthetic implications of form, and sculptors and environmental artists incorporating architectonic elements in their creations), institutional barriers need to fall and entrenched attitudes need to change before artist-designer collaborations can become commonplace.

- Public Policy and Design: Over the past half-century, Americans have seen how well-intentioned public policies aimed at curing one social ill have often caused unexpected problems in other areas. This paradox has been particularly true in the relationship of public policy to the design of the built environment: One has only to look at how federal highway and mortgage-assistance programs have affected the rural landscape.

Yet the design and planning professions are seldom consulted before policies rife with design implications become law and regulation. Instead, they’re called in after the fact to deal with adverse consequences. It is ironic that those who develop public policy are often called “architects of policy.”

Of course, the responsibility lies not only with the policy makers, but also with the design professions themselves. They must make their voices heard at the earliest phases of policy development. If the design professions are to contribute to policy formulation, they must create the opportunities to bring about the dialogue.

• Energy-Conscious Design: As our nation has become more aware of the depletion of its energy supplies and feels the impact of energy scarcity on our lifestyles, enormous sums of public and private money are being spent on alternative energy sources. The public sector’s response has been principally to seek out technological solutions—better solar collectors, heat pumps, windmills. Little attention has been focused on “passive” design solutions to this problem. Increased sensitivity to building orientation, micro-climate, settlement patterns, materials usage, natural ventilation, and solar access can profoundly alter the energy consumption of our homes and workplaces. The design and planning fields can play a major role in showing alternatives to inefficient energy practices and expensive new technologies.

This agenda addresses many of the central questions that will continue to confront the design fields over the next decade. It is also clear that the National Endowment for the Arts’ small resources can only begin to raise public awareness about these issues. Continuing its historic “Johnny Appleseed” role, the Design Arts Program hopes that new and innovative design solutions to these pervasive problems will emerge. Certainly the small grants and advocacy activities listed on the following pages indicate the depth of concern in the design community and the potential for significant contributions by that community to a more livable America.

For experimental and innovative research on design that seeks to define or resolve new or recurring design problems.

For an experimental graphic design research to construct a graphic language which could translate unreadable amounts of computer code into simpler faces.

To prepare new case studies of innovative design techniques and for training in professional schools and continuing education programs.

To prepare a post-occupancy evaluation handbook on the architectural design of buildings in Albuquerque for design practitioners.

To produce a design Manuel on climate-sensitive design.

To explore and document passive solar design principles applied in the development of a 144,200 sq. foot building in Philadelphia.

To prepare an illustrated report, a series of seminars, and a film on management strategies for the design and construction of open public spaces.

For the research for a prototype residence for severely physically disabled people.
Design Fellowships

Includes four subcategories: Senior-Level Sabbatical Fellowships provide time for accomplished professional designers to explore areas of interest or new approaches to design. Individual Project Fellowships are for professional designers and other qualified individuals to carry out a specific design, research, or educational project. Entering Professional Designer Project Fellowships are for professional designers in the early stages of career development or designers returning to the field after a prolonged absence to carry out a specific design, research, or educational project. Design Student Project Fellowships are awarded to accredited institutions to provide scholarships to selected design students in their final year of a graduate degree program.

EXPRESSIONS 80
A FESTIVAL OF BLACK & HISPANIC ARTS
JUNE 27, 28, & 29
The Afro-American Historical & Cultural Museum
7th & Arch Street
ART, DANCE, MUSIC & THEATER (DRAMA) FREE
SUPPORTED BY PENNSYLVANIA COUNCIL FOR THE ARTS, AFRICAN AMERICAN HISTORICAL AND CULTURAL MUSEUM, THE MINORITY ARTS RESOURCE COUNCIL & THE MID-ATLANTIC STATES ART CONSERVATORY, WITH FUNDING FROM THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE ARTS
The Expansion Arts Program supports arts organizations that represent the cultural diversity of America. These groups are urban and rural, multi-hued and multi-lingual. They are rich in artistic innovation, and they operate principally in and for the communities that make up the variegated cultural landscape of this country.

Expansion Arts is especially interested in art that reflects cultural traditions which most established institutions have largely neglected. To use the art form of theater as an example, the National Black Theater has developed an accessible, yet avant-garde theatrical approach based on the rituals of Africa and of the Holiness Church. Likewise, Teatro Campesino has built a modern Brechtian repertory based on the culture, ancient and contemporary, of Hispanics in California. And, in the same vein, East West Players has developed a unique contemporary theater style that incorporates the techniques of Noh and Kabuki. The Expansion Arts Program has been a central force in bringing national attention to artistic organizations such as these.

Most of the Expansion Arts field is involved in teaching or producing art, or both. In 1980 we revised our grant categories in order to serve our primary organizations better. Instead of applying for grants for activities like "Instruction and Training" or "Arts Exposure," as they did before, arts groups will now apply by discipline, under such categories as "Performing Arts" and "Visual Arts."

One reason for this change is that since 1971, when this Program was begun, a good many of our organizations have diversified as they have matured, and they now do many different things. What started out as a dance school may have spawned a dance company made up of former students. (The Dance Theater of Harlem, for example, began as an Expansion Arts grantee years ago with its ballet school; today it is a major ballet company that receives grants from the Dance Program, while the school is still funded by Expansion Arts.) Such a group should not have to choose between applying for money for its training work or for its dance productions in the community. Under the new system, it could use a grant for both.

A problem with the categories used previously was that they were all interdisciplinary and required interdisciplinary panels. The same panel considered theater companies, museums, dance companies, and everything else. Because of this, it was difficult to establish a review process based on comparing similar organizations. The breakout by discipline enables us to concentrate the expertise of our panels for the different discipline areas, and assures consistency in the application of high artistic standards.

Another important benefit of the reorganized structure is that it makes interchanges with the Endowment's discipline programs easier and increases the possibility of joint funding efforts. To this end, we are having discussions with other program directors about applicants who interest us both, and we have begun to share panelists with other programs.

It is our intention, with this new format, to move away from project support toward consideration of the organization as a whole. We will make grants to help organizations become more stable artistically and administratively. The concept is one of institution strengthening, and to do this we will focus our funding by determining which organizations are the most important in the field. With this in mind, we have decided to emphasize year-around projects and eliminate the "Summer Projects" category when the current guidelines expire.

This past year, Expansion Arts helped lay the groundwork for the Advancement Grant Program. These grants, which may range from $20,000 to $150,000, will go to a select group of arts organizations which produce the most excellent work in the field. They were chosen by a blue ribbon panel following a rigorous review process. These grants will assist the 15 organizations in securing their cadre of artists, achieving broader visibility, and developing more sophisticated management techniques.

Most of the Advancement grantees have developed artistically, in less than two decades, from their grass-roots origins to be included among the nation’s major cultural assets. They have gained national and even international attention by creating or encouraging innovative work that attracts large audiences. Their founders, most of whom are artists, have been widely recognized. The Advancement grants are meant to match the artistic excellence of these artists and their organizations with the managerial power that will enable them to grow and flourish in the coming decades.

During 1980 we began to expand our evaluation program. This has greatly helped panelists review applications. More than 300 groups were visited by Expansion Arts panelists or consultants, who then filled out a detailed written questionnaire. Most of the organizations covered this year were current grantees; next year we hope to be able to visit more new applicants and do about 600 evaluations. Next year we are also planning to study the issue of technical assistance and decide Expansion Arts’ future direction in this area.

Our CityArts Program, which has as a goal encouraging city governments to fund arts programs from their own budgets, has proven remarkably successful. At least 12 of the 14 city governments that have taken part in this three-year granting experiment have created strong funding programs for their Expansion Arts clientele. The city of San Antonio, which received a CityArts grant of $267,500, now has a budget of $1 million for community arts groups. Federal funds acted as leverage to get another $1 million in private contributions. Similar success stories can be told about the other CityArts grantees.

Now, as Expansion Arts moves into its 10th year, it nourishes a field that repays us a hundredfold with rich artistic gifts all over the country—in Appalachian towns, Hopi pueblos, center city stages, and in many other places as well.

CENTRAL OREGON FOLKLIFE FESTIVAL

JUNE 10-11

Join us for a weekend of celebration, learning, and fun, featuring traditional music, dance, storytelling, and crafts. Admission is free. Don't miss out on this unique opportunity to experience the rich cultural tapestry of Central Oregon.

Directions: Take I-5 to exit 231, then follow signs to Bend. From Bend, drive east on US-20 for approximately 15 miles. The festival grounds are located on the right.
It probably takes 10,000 little girls playing "Fur Elise" on the piano to produce one Dame Myra Hess. Exactly why this is so is not clear, but at least two factors emerge as important. First, the social desirability of piano-playing has to be publicly established and widely accepted before the Myra Hesses among the 10,000 will identify themselves. Second, the pedagogical, economic, and distributional support structures have to be manned by the other 9,999 in order for a Dame Myra's artistry to be effectively developed.

The most notable examples of all arts and art forms are not skyrockets but atolls, the tips of submerged mountains, and there is no way to say which is more important to a mountain—the base or the top. Since its founding, the Arts Endowment has struggled with the problem of the vastness of the arts continuum. Such Council members as Gunther Schuller have argued with passion and eloquence that we must pay primary attention to the entire social climate wherein the arts can flourish. He calls our proper area of concern "education" in its widest sense. Others have maintained with equal conviction that, with our limited resources, we can cultivate only the tops of the mountain peaks; thus, the proliferation of individual fellowships.

Folk Arts has always seemed to me like a miniature Endowment. We have every one of the problems, in small form but bewildering number. Our most reliable datum is that 100 percent of all Americans have practiced some form of folk art at one time or another (sung a lullaby, told an old story, whittled a chain, whistled a tune, danced a square, "fooled around" on an instrument). These are our "Fur Elise" players, and they are omnipresent.

We have approached our task by emphasizing two strategies. These strategies overlap, of course. Thinking at this level—unscrambling the cultural omelet—is a pretty imprecise endeavor.

Our first strategy has been framing. By encouraging exhibits, documentation through all kinds of media, and various sorts of formal performances, we have in effect put a frame around the flow of life in traditional communities and said, "Hey, you didn't know it, but this thing you do is art." This is a very Western European high art idea, of course; the Chairman observed on his trips to Hopi and Samoa that in these places art infuses everyday life to the point that it is difficult to distinguish between the two, and Margaret Mead tells us that in such a language as Balinese there is not even an available word for "art."

On bad days we tend to think of framing as the ultimate co-option of the innocent by a society that is determined to make a buck out of everything it touches, turning every act into a packageable and saleable commodity. On good days, we hope that we are providing smaller cultures with a defense mechanism whereby they can protect their art forms and carry them into the future.

Our second strategy has been feedback. This is framing turned around, so that the arts of the people are presented back to the people who created them. A. B. Spellman calls it "inreach," as opposed to "outreach." It is probably most effectively done through the media, which carry within themselves a sense of cultural authority and a special prestige; but such devices as local festivals and exhibits of community arts within the community also seem to have a strong positive effect. This has always been Folks Arts' basic strategy; our tours of Appalachian musicians to migrant Appalachian neighborhoods in the upper Midwest, of Irish singers and dancers to Irish-American communities in northeastern cities are cases in point.

We must now decide if the time has come to add an outreach program to our list of strategies.

Outreach reinforces and corrupts simultaneously; the changes essential for presenting Appalachian story-telling or Canadian-American step-dancing to inexperienced audiences modify the art forms being presented. On the other hand, they preserve them too; the approval of the general public may be the essential factor in preventing severe cultural loss.

Outreach, in a sense, is being forced on us by the emergence of professional-calibre, appropriate-to-the-general-public performing groups, museum exhibits, media productions, and displays of all kinds. Nowadays we occasionally find ourselves assisting in the development of actual professionalism among the folks. This has not, heretofore, been a stated aim; but, when you persuade people to stick their heads up out of the tall grass, you then have to stand ready to help them get established in the larger world, if that's what they want. This is where the current paucity of culturally experienced and imaginative producing organizations is so hampering.

However, we are heartened by the increasing interest of the states in developing their own folk arts advocacy through their folk arts coordinator programs. This is the pay-off for our long-maintained insistence that folk arts must be treated with the same high-level critical attention paid to standard disciplines. Folk arts are not simply "community arts." They have their own internally recognized criteria for excellence; and individual excellence is as rare, as precious, and as widely recognized among Navajo weavers as it is among classical pianists. More and more arts groups are therefore turning to folk arts specialists to assist them in identifying and supporting the highest calibre of the vast range of folk artists in their regions. The Folk Arts Program had first feared that this program might result in the proliferation of mid-level bureaucrats and become yet another obstacle in getting funds directly to artists. We're beginning to relax about that now; where the local folk arts coordinator is experienced and sensitive, the federal job is becoming easier.

On the eve of commencing our fourth year as a formal Endowment Program, Folk Arts believes itself to be in pretty good shape. Our current guidelines are working well; we had set out first to reinforce the base of that mountain and it is getting stronger every day. Now, without relaxing our concern for the substructure, we must turn part of our attention to the peaks as well as to those parts of our mountain-range yet unexplored. The next three years should be as exciting as the last.

When Special Projects changed its name this year to "Inter-Arts," we were dramatizing a confidence and clarity of vision we had not had before. As language, "special projects" could refer to anything; "Inter-Arts," although not without its blurred edges, is firmly in the camp of the arts. It is an interdisciplinary arm of the Arts Endowment.

Projects that incorporate more than one art form, where no single art is dominant, and institutions that offer more than one art form to the public—both come under our purview.

In effect, this means that our funding categories range from service organizations and presenting organizations to artists' colonies and collaborative works that are neither sculpture, theater, music, dance, nor video but something innovative that may involve all of them equally.

That said, let us focus on the most critical part of the program—the one whose formulation brought us the greatest challenge during 1980: the evolving program for presenting organizations.

There are some who fear that the energy shortage and the increasing sophistication of television signal a decline in the presentation of live performing arts. In the future, they believe, audiences will remain at home, flick on the TV set, and be able to watch anything from Sophocles to the Alvin Ailey dance company. With access both to "live" TV performances and video cassettes, the expectation is that we will have, in our living rooms, the equivalent of a reader's library containing a full range of literature: from classics and popular novels, to the newest experimental poetry.

The vision is exhilarating and devoutly to be wished. Clearly technological advances are propelling us into the whole area of reproduced performance. But reproduction cannot substitute for live performances because contact between audiences and performers is artistically irreplaceable. The dynamic that develops between them occurs only in live-performance settings where a sympathetic collaboration nurtures and inspires artists and breathes life into their performances. This dynamic is what the Inter-Arts Program fosters when we help support presenting organizations. In turn, presenters have an inspiring effect on the artistic life of their communities.

Our efforts this year have gone primarily into developing a program to strengthen presenting organizations and helping them do the job they are best able to do: bringing high-quality live performing arts and artists together with responsive audiences. Some presenters have needed help in increasing their earned incomes; they have applied to Inter-Arts for grants to hire fundraisers and to launch fund-raising campaigns. Others have judged their immediate need to develop new audiences and have applied for funds to undertake audience surveys. Who are their potential audiences? What kinds of programming will appeal to them most? What factors have kept them from purchasing tickets? Once a presenter knows the full extent of its potential audiences, it can direct its efforts toward reaching them. Inter-Arts is helping to support such marketing efforts as outreach programs, computerized mailing lists, and targeted advertising.

It is a misconception, by the way, to think that because presenting organizations offer artistically sound and exciting programs that people will inevitably flock to see them. First of all, people need to be aware of what is being presented. Then they have to be motivated to attend. That's what marketing is for. Once people experience a live performance of high artistry, they discover what many of them could not have known before: that professional artists provide a quality of experience that few or no amateurs can, and it is addictive. Presenters then have to find ways of stimulating that interest: through better and more responsive programming and by making performances affordable to those segments of the audience that cannot easily purchase tickets. Here again, Inter-Arts can assist. We are helping to support program developers and innovative subscription projects.

The goal of the Presenting Organizations
BROOKLYN ACADEMY of MUSIC

America’s Oldest Performing Arts Center
Program within Inter-Arts is not to create an artificial demand for an unnecessary product. Our aim is to make the performing arts—one element of the rich and diversified culture of this nation—more accessible to more people. Although we are necessarily interested in method—in the ways we can intelligently and effectively assist presenters—how we help is less important than why we help.

There are two reasons: One takes us into the structure of the Endowment itself. The discipline Programs support their own disciplines and, among other things, help their artists to tour the country. But no matter how generous the support, a dance company, a theater company, a string quartet need, once they are on tour, suitable places to perform and people to perform for. In other words, they need professional presenters or sponsors that can provide facilities and attract audiences. But often performing artists have found themselves in locations without either. The presenters were not up to the task. Hence, in order to improve the touring experience for performing artists, the Endowment began to consider a program to assist presenters.

The second reason is as simple as “Man cannot live by bread alone.” Yet because of tight budgets and, in many cases, restricted vision, our country has given little more than lip service to the truism. More and more often our educational system has ceased to reinforce the arts. When the arts are taught, they are rarely contemporary arts—the arts that grow out of our lives, our times. Narrowly, our schools often think that “serious” music is only Beethoven and Mozart, that “serious” art is only Michelangelo and, perhaps, the Impressionists, that “serious” drama is only Shakespeare.

Presenting organizations, which at their best are leaders in bringing high-quality contemporary arts to the public, are also sometimes bound by traditional perceptions and have limited visions of what programming ought to be; their assumption, as it were, is that everyone needs to love Beethoven. This is untrue and unrealistic. America is made up of many cultures; it is vast, non-homogenous, and multi-racial. No “official” group of composers or painters or playwrights is going to reach and inspire everyone.

We have to counteract the conditioning that wishes to confine our artistic lives to “approved” forms of creative expression and to the notion—held by some presenters and some members of the audience as well—that the arts are created for only an elite.

There are millions of people whose lives can be enriched by the arts. But because they have gotten their exposure to the arts in a joyless context, or because their own art forms have been ignored or diminished by the artistic establishment, they may be hard to attract. But they are reachable if presenting organizations approach them sympathetically and offer them art experiences of high quality that will satisfy their unexpressed longings for meaning and joy and transcendence.

The poet Louise Bogan once wrote: “First that it should be romantic, exciting; then, that it should be bearable; and at last, that it should be understandable. These are the stages which we go through, in forming our desires concerning life.” Precisely because the arts can and do help to satisfy those desires, it is important that they are made available to the widest possible public. Neither young nor old may be ignored. Ethnic and black performing arts of the highest quality must be presented, too, and not merely to ethnic and black audiences. The contemporary arts, difficult because they are unfamiliar to both audiences and critics, should be made accessible to the public, and the public encouraged—in non-patronizing ways—to appreciate them. Presenters can make all that happen.

1980 has been a good year for the Inter-Arts Program in all our categories of support. But particularly by shaping a new program of grants to presenters, we are helping both to enlarge audiences for the performing arts and to encourage the spread of the arts to all corners of America. My staff and I look forward to the next challenges.

Silently, unexpectedly
Brightening up the dreary scene.

Minoru Furusho

From America’s beginning, writers have been at the forefront of its culture, extending the edge of perception, looking both outward and inward to define all that is ours, all that is human.

A literature that includes a Cotton Mather, a Louisa May Alcott, a Bernard Malamud, and an Alice Walker is by definition rich, diverse, and debatable. But although writers and critics can, and do, argue endlessly over standards of excellence, over form and content, none deny the cultural importance, the cultural necessity of literature.

Yet for many people, comprehending the place of writers in contemporary society and the specific nature of their problems is difficult if not impossible, in part because literature’s value and impact on society are simply not quantifiable. Not only is writing itself a solitary art form, but more often than not it is read and appreciated in private. Unlike the mural or the public monument, unlike music and theater performed before audiences, most novels and poems are created to reach one person at a time. Literature’s demonstrated power to embrace groups, to shape generations, and to change history lies in the controlling genius of the writer.

But such dramatic effects—the impact of Thoreau’s Walden on Tolstoy and, through him, on Gandhi and the liberation of India, or of Harriet Beecher Stowe’s Uncle Tom’s Cabin on the Northern public prior to the Civil War—can occur only when the writer’s words reach the public.

Ultimately, the Literature Program is devoted to helping that contact happen.

First we are concerned with the creators of literature. Whether they are novelists, poets, or even script writers, writers are rarely able to support themselves directly from their work. In fact, they remain among the least employed and lowest paid of all creative artists, a class of workers not noted for high incomes. And that is not because they lack talent. Two of the greatest figures in American literature, Walt Whitman and Herman Melville, were financial failures in their lifetimes.

Publishers also tend not to be rich in financial resources. The profit levels of publishers are far lower than those of many other businesses. Booksellers are beset with economic woes, and public libraries are in terrible financial straits. Yet these are the primary institutions through which writers reach the public.

While many writers have persevered in the face of terrible circumstances, and will continue to do so, financial rewards commensurate with the cultural value of their work are rightfully important to them. Although no Endowment program can begin to insure such rewards, the Literature Program always has supported individual writers of excellence through its fellowships, which we see as investments in the creativity of individual writers. This portion of our Program is of the highest significance. We remain convinced that the literary return on our investment will be long-lasting and of far greater value than the modest funds we are able to offer. The creative work accomplished by the 900 writers who have received Endowment fellowships has been substantial. Their diverse contributions to literature and to the public have already been of consequence. In all our planning for the future, our commitment to the writer remains foremost; helping to support the excellence of American writers affirms the primacy of the creative individual in art and in society.

Helping to enlarge the opportunities for writers to get their work into print is equally crucial. Freedom of expression in literature requires publication of the writer’s words. Unfortunately, access to commercial publication is no longer certain today, not even for the very best writers. Commercial magazines publishing serious fiction and poetry have virtually disappeared. As the book industry becomes increasingly beleagured, noncommercial publishing—the “little” magazines and small presses—has assumed ever greater importance. In fact, for many writers, poets particularly, these outlets provide their only opportunities for their works to reach the reading public. And yet these noncommercial publishers are also in difficult straits; their financial and managerial resources are often marginal. Here, too, the Literature Program recognizes a responsibility: By helping excellent small presses and little magazines fulfill their artistic goals and achieve their fullest potential, we believe that we can make a genuine contribution to literature and those who read it. Our only regret is that we are able to do so little. In 1980 there was an unusually large number of applicants in this category—a demonstration of the vitality and growth of the field—but we were able to offer actual grant support to only 60 percent of the small presses and little magazines recommended for funding, which means that less than 40 percent of all those applying received grants.

These grants to noncommercial publishers of books and magazines are relatively few each year, even if we include the grants made by the Coordinating Council of Literary Magazines, which once again received support from the Literature Program. But there are other ways to contribute to the field: In recent years, for example, a number of organizations have been formed in order to serve the varied needs of noncommercial publishers in the areas of design, production, and distribution. Recognizing the value of these organizations, the Literature Program in 1980 expanded and fully realized its “Distribution and Promotion” category, through which we offer modest support to a broad range of projects. There is little question that, in coming years, the organizations supported in this category will become increasingly important to the Program’s efforts toward making the full range of contemporary literature available to the broadest possible audience.

While publishing and disseminating the written word is the most obvious means of writers reaching the public, we believe that the contact between writers and their audiences made possible by readings and residencies is often of equal importance. Apart from providing valuable sources of income for writers, these activities bring writers as flesh-and-blood residents into communities nationwide. There they have become part of people’s lives. They have helped to write local histories, they have created publications, collected oral literatures, written films and plays about the places Americans live. They have also used their skills and sensitivities in working with the elderly and the handicapped to stimulate creativity and validate their experiences as individuals. Other writers have participated in local reading series and have brought their words to life in front of audiences, often the only way a writer can hear his or her own words resonate. Funds in this category have never been sufficient, but in 1980 far more applications were received, and more grants given, than in any previous year.

What motivates us is a commitment to literature. What excites us is the sheer quantity and breadth of current work. What challenges us is the complexity of the scene, the fact of change, and the difficulty of assessing the variety of new voices. What encourages us is our vision of what literature has always meant, and continues to mean, to human beings individually and to society as a whole. For millions of living Americans, contemporary literature offers perspectives about the human experience, especially the human experience that is our nation. Because of its diversity and, sometimes, its difficult complexities, we are often confused about its meanings—just as we may be confused by the complexities of contemporary society. But no matter how difficult, literature has always helped to lead us out of confusion. Contemporary literature does no less.

Senior Fellowships (Pilot)

Funds from Services to the Field have been used to begin a pilot category, Senior Fellowships. The purpose of this category is to support creative writers who have had a substantial impact on our literary heritage, but who are not widely known outside the literary field. These awards will allow the writers to set aside time to continue their creative efforts and will bring their work to the attention of a wider audience.

The following writers were awarded $15,000 each:

18th NEW YORK FILM FESTIVAL
PRESENTED BY THE FILM SOCIETY OF LINCOLN CENTER
SEPTEMBER 26 - OCTOBER 12, 1980 - ALICE TULLY HALL
THE 18th NEW YORK FILM FESTIVAL IS MADE POSSIBLE IN PART WITH PUBLIC FUNDS FROM THE NEW YORK STATE ARTS COUNCIL AND THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE ARTS.
Media Arts: Film/Radio/Television

Media are impure, and that impurity is to be cherished. So much is done in their name (we hear) that media get a bad rap. Does print answer for the fact that the IRS tax forms use the same language as Shakespeare's sonnets? Media — vigorous, banal, vulgar, and endlessly fascinating (a little like America itself) — have an uncomfortable relation to our formal expectations about art. This is to their advantage. Ideas about art arrive when a medium is about to swoon into that useful museum of culture we call tradition. Even media are not immune from those social discriminations masquerading as esthetics — movies are "film," a higher kind of art; television is "video." Only radio is radio, though when I hear "audio art" I know its time is coming. The impurity of media, however — the brusque, unprotected congruity of excellence with kitsch — is to be lamented only by purists whose idealism conceals, I feel, an authoritarian urge. Media are pervasive, messy, and, like life, generally uncontrollable. While in the Media Arts Program we all carry around our little Platonic diagrams about how our Program might be designed, they are corrected by the unruly nature of the field itself. The first question asked in this department — and which always needs to be asked — is: When do media become "art"?

Like print or movement or sound, media become art when they are used surpassingly well. As in the other arts, this is irrespective of content. No forms of content are proscribed — you can't tell a flower painter not to paint dahlias. The aesthetic rationale — the artist's freedom to create in whatever area he or she determines — quickly leads to issues of social responsibility, especially in the case of media, when the content is often seen before the art.

When this Program was founded in 1972, its definition of media was two-fold: Media were conceived as a kind of all-purpose utensil to carry other arts to the audience; and also as an activity through which artists conducted that process of free inquiry so familiar in the other arts. This philosophy — of media as vessel and as avant-garde exercise — served the early Program well. By the late seventies two changes occurred with such reciprocal precision, indeed elegance, that the field had to be redefined.

In one of the more important social changes of the seventies, film and video artists moved from a marginal position into the social and cultural mainstream. As the media arts community grew in numbers, achievement, and energy, this department grew with it. The effectiveness of this community depends on a support system of media art centers, exhibition centers, access to post-production equipment and, of course, to the audience. We are now witnessing the growth of this framework within which media artists conduct their professional lives. The early Media Arts Program (then called Public Media) made a pioneering commitment to equipment, to hardware, encouraging public access and education. We are now hoist on our own hardware. Often used 24 hours a day, that hardware has worn out, and replacement costs are beyond this Program's capacity. Possibly surplus GSA equipment may help resupply this hardware, but our constituents are currently finding their tools breaking in their hands. This is a critical problem for the field.

The phrase "independent media community" is deceptive. It includes a variety of genres (narrative film, documentary, experimental film and video, animation) and a multitude of esthetic, ideological, and social viewpoints. In this it reflects the country's pluralism. This community now has a formidable presence; it increasingly affects public opinion as it transfers the arts to an ever-wider audience. Its role is thus educational in the best democratic sense, in that it adds new and responsible voices to the national dialogue.

If the health of a democracy is judged in part by the degree to which it encourages self-examination then the independent media community is a national asset. In the exercise of its diverse modes, the independent community often intersects with the issues of the day in a way not available to most other arts. Thus this department's definition of media has broadened. So enters the question of art's proper province. Should it concern itself with "art," a self-contained, self-regulated entity, or should it be, as Matthew Arnold described poetry, a criticism of life? This may be one of those rather spurious alternatives we are sometimes asked to face: to some degree the activity of the media artist has answered it.
The American Film Institute presents:

THE NATIVE AMERICAN IMAGE ON FILM

April 2-29, 1980 • American Film Institute Theater • Kennedy Center

The arrival of the independent media community coincides with the greatest revolution since the invention of broadcasting: the translation of the long-imminent technological utopia into a matter of urgent empirical readings. Satellite, cable, and disc are complex technologically. But their effects can be understood by anyone who uses a telephone. These systems (hardware) have multiplied the modes of delivering programs and information (software). Indeed, they have so outstripped the available programming that we are now in the midst of a great software hunger. The network monopolies, which sustained the illusion of a unified society comfortably residing within its media-generated myths, has been joined by a polyglot chorus. Local communities and special interests once again emphasize the country's pluralism, now powerfully augmented by media. For each special interest may identify and consolidate a cable audience. Numerous interests are asking this question: Is there an audience for a single channel, an all-news network, an all-black network? Television thus follows the evolutionary law of print and radio. General interest magazines give way to special interest magazines (popular electronics, golf, "little" magazines). Radio (all news, all classical, all talk, all rock, all disco) sieves through the audience to retain configurations of like taste. Each special interest closes its circle and questions the market: Does it have the numbers?

Do the arts have the numbers? No area has provoked such excitement around the electronic smorgasbord. In May 1980 the FACE (Performing Arts Culture and Entertainment) Report brilliantly sketched a self-supporting structure for a cable arts network. Now ABC and CBS have drawn up plans for subscription arts networks to begin in mid-1981. New material is being commissioned; old material recovered from the memory bank where film and video lie frozen; arts institutions are speculating on their cable and disc futures. What will be the effect of this new world—a world of marvellous entrepreneurial excitement—upon the arts?

Predictions of the effects of new technology are notoriously inaccurate. We nearly always forget the vulnerable and self-serving biped that turns it off and on, and we cannot read the economic factor sharply enough. The multiple cable channels, each offering their specialty, will of course compete with each other, as radio stations do now. Each offering must be financed and sold to our attention. How many arts channels can we sustain? And for what kind of arts? The performing arts are now being harnessed to the arts coach. Their real time fits snugly into television time. The establishment performing arts—opera, symphony, drama, and dance—should flourish up to a saturation point; located no one knows quite where. The non-performing arts will have a more difficult time, as they have had on public television. Since their formats have to be invented, the producer's imaginative leap has to be greater. Indeed, where are the directors and producers, the successors to the pioneers who set the first wave of performing arts rolling on public television with such programs as Dance in America and Live from Lincoln Center? Next year, the Endowment plans to support a small apprentice-ship program to pass on the skills that make that complex, hybrid art when media are used to transfer the other arts.

What of small-audience, advanced art? Cable has been seen as its obliging benefactor. It is essential that such advanced art maintain itself. Indeed, a strong case can be made that it is the guarantor of our cultural health. Confining it to a single channel may ghettoize it. Using it to diversify the arts offering on an establishment channel will tend to co-opt it. If such art—difficult, sometimes opaque, and often controversial—fails to fit into the multiplied access spectrum, it would be a cruel paradox. Ultimately, access is either a regulatory problem and/or a funding problem. (It's no secret that the structure of nongovernment funding has undergone changes that are not all for the better, but this is not the place to examine them.) The present cornucopia of opportunity on cable may be deceptive. It is probably limited to a few exhilarating years. How do we gain access for, and preserve the vitality of, say, video art, which resolutely pursues its own image in a mass-medium and in which this country is the undoubted leader? Cable will, I think, affect the circulation between the dialectically counterposed energies of establishment art and advanced art, the definers of a healthy culture.

These, then, are the two great changes within which our activities are being redefined: the maturing of the independent community and of the technological utopia. What of our response to all this? Since July 1979, the Endowment has been concerned that the new opportunities for cable access not be left exclusively to the serendipitous curve of commerce. With new media, commercial use comes first, then its esthetic assimilation follows. This is history's blunt lesson and the Endowment has learned it. So this department's short-term goals include showcasing the brilliant performances of the independent media artist over the past eight years by taking advantage of satellite cable opportunities. The nature of this programming is pungent, individual, alert; the pulse of the country's many cultures beats through it. It shows the strength and independence of communities, an obstinate pluralism characterized by an engaging and often aggressive lack of cant. Through a grant to the Appalachian Community Service Network (ACSN), a non-profit educational network with a national footprint, six hours a week of this programming will go to a million homes in the late spring of 1981, with limited rights to material secured on a non-exclusive basis. This experiment should encourage communities' traditional roots to strike deeper, test whether the artistic nugget can attract the viewer from the glittering surfaces of commercial broadcasting, and enhance the self-awareness of the independent community.

The ACSN project is part of the Programming in the Arts venture, the Endowment's attempt, now eight years old, to give large audiences access to the arts through the media. This endeavor now has its own tradition: the notable Visions series of original plays for television (1974-1978), Live from Lincoln Center, and from the Metropolitan Opera, Dance in America, now in its sixth year, and the Documentary Fund at the TV lab of WNET (begun in 1978). Programming in the Arts was made an Endowment priority for fiscal year 1981; its budget doubled to $6.2 million. This year's plans will be matured out of next year's funds to realize the strongest initiative since Programming in the Arts began. Already a jazz series is in production at KCET, Los Angeles; a $700,000 grant for a series on architecture and design has been made to WETA, Washington, D.C.; an invitation for proposals for a music theater series has harvested a good response; a visual arts series with the filmmaker/art historian Barbara Rose is in production; an 11-part series on folk music will be broadcast next spring. The American Masters series, in which films are made intermittently on major American artists for present and future audiences, continues with these recent additions: Lee Strasberg and the Actor's Studio, the photographer Ansel Adams, the novelist John Dos Passos, and the jazz composer Mary Lou Williams. Future plans center around a broadcast magazine of all the arts which will, it is expected, encourage a vigorous discourse on issues, esthetic and otherwise, that define the nature and direction of the arts.

No art is more subtly inflected by its display environment than film, video, and radio. Judgments on quality seem to echo where and how they were seen. Is this an indication of how slippery and mutable the media, particularly film, are? Now that modes of delivering film are undergoing radical revision (cable, disc, cassette), what will this do to our viewing habits? Many of us were incubated in the film-goer's classic monad—the screen irradiated by a cone of light, the fugitive shadows on a membraneous space, the darkness enfolding its collective of wonder and suspense. Is this to become a nostalgic fragment of period iconography? What will it take to get us out of our homes? Where will this leave an initiative begun this year: the packaging and circulation of film's classic and contemporary canon, thus offering irreplaceable field work for the interested audience? Will the new home-bound technology, as Virgil Grillo speculates, inversely emphasize the curatorial tradition of our media arts and exhibition centers, clarifying their task and transferring to them the care of the great tradition of film itself? Already the numbers are not negligible: over two million people left their homes this year to participate in Endowment-supported media exhibitions.

Exhibition, along with Media Arts Centers and Production, is a priority for Media Arts Program funding; all are now under the stewardship of the new Assistant Director for Media Arts, Virgil Grillo, former Director of the Rocky Mountain Film Center. Another theme this year was the further diversification of production grants into regional and emerging artists fellowships. Also, this year saw a splendid new phase in the life of our largest grantee, the American Film Institute. Rather than elucidate these and other programming modifications, it seems more important to comment on the major changes in the media field, which are also reflected in the changed administrative structure of this department. Our commitments to the media arts constituency and to programming in the arts have expanded to the point where each needs the guidance of an assistant director. With the expansion of Programming in the Arts, Catherine Wyler, formerly Assistant Director of all the departments, will focus on this area. For the first time radio will have its own department in the Media Arts Program under the care of Donald Drucker.

There is a saying among younger radio professionals that "the future of television is radio." This seems true insofar as radio has already tested many of the technological strategies now available to television. Well before public television, radio was delivering programs nationally by satellite, making possible those communities of interest and taste not bounded by geography—what Daniel Boorstin calls “everywhere communities.” Technically, radio’s advances have been extraordinary, and they coincide with the emergence of a brilliant new generation of radio producers. Until recently, the cumbersome system of monaural broadcasting by telephone line was in use. But now radio producers are able to offer high quality stereo programming to groups of stations in one area, or to stations specializing in a particular format (e.g., Spanish language) wherever located, or to the entire public radio system. This protean adaptability makes radio the most supple of media. Thousands of stations have now experimented with formats, specialized programming, interaction with listeners, and with non-broadcast distribution of software. Satellite distribution has been grafted onto this body of experience. Radio is now poised to harvest the country’s diversity by suddenly reforming communities of interest depending on the “cut” made through its millions of listeners.

So this year’s report is made against a background of massive change. Film is making strong liaison with the small screen via satellite, disc, and cassette. Disc is showing an omnivorous appetite for information, which it regurgitates with impeccable precision. Radio is capitalizing on satellite, on its portability (like a dog, it follows its master everywhere), and on the producing talents of a new generation. An influential constituency of independent artists have gained access to that small screen—which, with its fluid strengths, magical displacements, spatial flatness, and temporal compressions is the most versatile of man’s invented spaces. However we conceive the arts—as a mere special interest or as transcendental propaganda—that small screen is going to convey them to huge audiences in ways that will circle back to touch on the nature of the arts themselves and how we receive them.

The Museum Program helps museums acquire, exhibit, interpret, and preserve their holdings. It is an extraordinary cooperative venture between government and museums. We are pleased to be able to give financial aid for such vital activities, and we feel enormous satisfaction at the way the system within which we operate responds.

But serious questions about the museum field have arisen, and we at the Endowment must consider them. Are museum people losing their confidence in the traditional value of what they are doing? Do those who work in art museums still really believe in the power of art to move human eyes and minds and souls? Are we now less worried about art than about attendance figures, marketing strategies, legal problems, fund-raising woes, and similar things? Workshops, seminars, and other forms of technical assistance have helped museum people tackle these issues. But scholarship, quality, preservation—terms that deal with the very substance of museums—are becoming catch phrases used for professional rhetoric, rather than everyday activities. Museums are less deeply involved with such ideas than they used to be, and this is too bad.

Today's museum worker greatly fears being labeled elitist, since there is a perception that wearing such a label might mean the end of federal or municipal funding. So, many museum people are using their creative skills to prove that multitudes are being touched by museums' efforts. There is great emphasis on the multitudes and little examination of the efforts. This is obviously a severe judgment. But museums are not alone; they are in good company. Our sister institutions, the public libraries, have spent the past few years assuring us that we need not be afraid—libraries are not just for books anymore. They offer concerts and similar activities too, so we can feel safe in entering. Why this fear of books, of learning, of judgments, of quality, and perhaps even of art? Why the attempt to cover up what a museum is while trying to make it palatable by adding a variety of new flavors?

We cannot blame this unfortunate trend all on double-digit inflationary concerns, since the trend antedates current economic crises. It had also begun before government funding agencies were around, so they cannot be made the culprits either. Can we attribute the problems to the social upheavals of the sixties? Perhaps. But if these upheavals account for the trend, there were obviously pre-existing weaknesses which these rumblings cracked even further.

Whatever its cause, this change is unmistakable. In recent pronouncements, museum officials have dwelt on a museum's duty to be socially aware and adaptable. But they only barely acknowledged the museum's role as a conservative institution: a place which preserves older, even perhaps outdated, values, where we can go to learn about our past, instead of merely swinging with our present.

Our greatest museums now give us very important new messages—the temporary exhibitions are all open, but some of the permanent collections may be closed. Relative values seem clear. Museums, which have up to now been one of our society's means of articulating the notion of permanence, are now sending out more and more bulletins about the transient. Even the world's best museums and the media with which they have made friends put forth every day.

The irony of all this is that we need not pine for an earlier, more glorious and romantic museum era. Things ought to be better than ever now, and not only because government funds distributed via a rather even-handed peer review system are available. We have expertise today, both academic and experience-generated, that did not exist years ago. More people are studying art, history, science, biology, botany, and all the other disciplines with which museums deal. And more of them are trying to use that study in the museum field. So we should be able to be better at our work than any generation that came before us. Better collection management, conservation, display techniques, scholarship, and publishing can all help us be useful to the present, sensitive to the past, and responsible to the future.

But museum people can only do these three things if they recapture the motivations that brought them into this work in the first place.
They must decide all over again what is most important. Less worry about planning and inflation will not make money crises disappear, but might make it possible to regain a sense of vision at the same time. If we do not have such a vision, we will homogenize museums, make them conform to meaningless outside standards, and deprive ourselves of the enrichment that museums can offer our society. No government agency, no matter how well-meaning or attuned to the field, can really make museums do such a rebalancing. It must come from the museum leaders themselves. And that sort of rebalancing within the field will keep the Museum Program's own goals in balance with the needs of museums in this country.

Twentieth Anniversary
1961 - 1981
Syracuse Symphony Orchestra
Christopher Keerie, Music Director
The new Grove's Dictionary of Music weighs 90 pounds and comes in 20 volumes; music has a long history. Although the Endowment's contribution to that history began a mere 15 years ago, we too fit into the historical perspective. We are patrons.

Individual patrons—the Esterhazys, the Brandenburgs, the Popes, and in our own time the Koussevitzkys, the Coolidges, the Carnegies—have died out. What has taken their place, in America, are the foundations and, now, the National Endowment for the Arts.

State patronage of the arts is new to America but familiar to Europe. The Paris Opera, for example, is totally state-supported (at a figure that exceeds the Endowment's funding for all the arts in America). In contrast, except in the rarest cases, the Music Program supplies no more than 10 percent of any institution's budget.

Given the nation's traditions and philosophy, the Endowment will play, always, only a modest financial role in the arts, but giving money is just the beginning of our responsibilities as patrons.

Although many people assume that all we do in the Music Program is hand out money or not hand out money—and it's true we do that—we also see our task as giving direction, as counseling, as helping to structure the field so that music is better served.

This year, for example, the Music Program has set in motion four brand-new areas of support, and beyond that we have changed and enlarged the direction of all our other areas of support.

The Composers' Program is a case in point. Because more and more groups of musicians wanted the excitement of playing music written especially for them by composers they admire, the Music Program developed a new category of funding. If three or more string quartets, say, want to commission new works, they come together, prepare a joint application, and present it to our Composers' Panel. If the panel likes what it sees—it judges on the quality of the consortium members and the composers they select to write for them—the application is funded. The composers are commissioned and they go about writing their works for the three quartets. The obligation of the quartets—or whatever performing groups comprise the consortium—is to perform each of the works at least twice.

Although the money we supply is immensely important here, perhaps our greater function is to act as catalyst between music groups and composers. By encouraging a splendid idea, we help add to the body of contemporary music and, in the process, make more contemporary music available to audiences.

In the same way, the four areas of support added this year in response to demands from the field—professional training, solo recitalists, recordings of American music, and music festivals—also have importance beyond the funds supplied. In writing guidelines for the festivals category, for example, our policy panel saw a way not merely to support music festivals but to enrich the lives of the people who attend them and to create both new audiences for music and new opportunities for musicians.

Through careful structuring of the guidelines, the Music Program encourages festivals in areas that have little otherwise going on in music. It can encourage the programming to be open, imaginative, and exploratory. Does the festival include, in addition to the beloved standbys, chamber music, interesting jazz, new American music? Does it provide activities to increase the audience’s ability to understand and appreciate unfamiliar music? Does it reach out to new audiences, to people who are not already part of the cultural circuit?

To be a patron like Count Brandenburg and receive the dedication of five concertos is one thing—and a great thing: We have been getting nourishment from those concertos for four centuries now. But shaping the field and building new audiences is no mean objective either. The more numerous and receptive the audiences, the more opportunities for all our wonderful musicians.

Musicians are the keystone. We are engaged—not just in 1980 but always—in assisting creative and performing musicians of exceptional talent. But to do so means concerning ourselves with the field of music as a whole—the artists who perform music and the artists who compose it; the audiences who listen to it and the institutions that bring them all together.

If because of our concern, jazz can establish itself for what it is—a major American art form—we are doing something that money alone cannot do. If with our help and encouragement larger audiences attend concerts and eagerly purchase recordings of lesser known soloists, electronic music, new jazz, choral works, then our contribution to the world of music will be far greater than the sums of money we have to offer.

Critics of the Endowment say that market value should determine which artists and art forms survive and which do not. It is totally untrue. They're equating goodness with market-ability. They're wrong. The Endowment's role—the Music Program's role—is to see to it that what is good survives in a consumer-oriented, competitive, throw-away society. The arts need financial support, certainly. More and more of it. But they also need protection and help. Tender Loving Care. We provide that not by acting like a Ministry of Music, which dictates what shall be played or composed, but by responding to the music that is happening in the country. We don't create series, we don't create music ensembles; we respond—with regrettably minimal funds but with maximum encouragement—to those that exist, to the extent that the quality of their activities warrants our support.

In the process, through the guidance and counsel of our panels, we encourage existent groups to improve an already fine thing, an already aesthetically valuable activity.

The point is that we are patrons of music not because we're doctrinaire and have a line to sell, and not because we want to improve our image. Our support of music comes from a desire to see to it that music survives. I wouldn't be here if I didn't believe what I'm saying.

Chamber Music

Includes two subcategories: Ensembles and Presenting Organizations are provided support in order to improve the quality of chamber music performances and to make the art form widely available. Services to Chamber Music are grants awarded to organizations for projects that serve professional chamber music ensembles on a national or regional basis.

Program funds: $157,200
Treasury funds: $194,000
Private gifts: $194,000

Ensembles and Presenting Organizations

During fiscal 1980 the Ford Foundation provided $150,000 as a direct gift to the Endowment to assist the funding of chamber music groups. To facilitate bookkeeping procedures, this money was awarded as "Private Gifts", which then released the same amount in Treasury Funds. Other chamber music organizations listed, but not funded in this manner, received program funds.

THE BARBER OF SEVILLE

It's the merriest romp in all opera!
Full of bubbly songs and high spirits.
All performances in English.
Why should the National Endowment for the Arts provide funds to support opera, an art form which was brought to the United States from its native Europe and which appeals to relatively few people? Why should the Endowment make grants to musical theater, which can earn large profits on Broadway? We are often asked questions like these, and we, too, ask them of ourselves.

We believe that both opera and musical theater are part of a wide music theater spectrum that includes a diverse and colorful variety of sung theater. Music theater is one of man's most basic, yet complex, arts. It enables him to celebrate his humanity through the drama of sung music, when the spoken word alone is inadequate to express his loves and hates, his joys and fears, his uncertainties and desires, his aspirations and passions.

Two-and-one-half years ago, the Opera-Musical Theater Program was created at the Endowment to provide public funds in support of music theater activities in all parts of the country. The following list of grants for the 1980-81 season describes those projects deemed worthy of assistance by the members of the panels listed in the following pages and by the National Council on the Arts and the Chairman of the Endowment. The panelists considered many more applications than could be funded with the money available and made their recommendations on several bases: the quality of the proposed project; its value to citizens and to the art of music theater; the excellence, stability, and potential for service of the group proposing it; and the likelihood that it could be carried out successfully.

It is always difficult to judge quality; such determinations are better left to history. The assistance of the National Endowment for the Arts, therefore, is most useful when it allows a broad and varied range of ideas and activities to enter the crucible of history. We can best serve our art by allowing its creators and interpreters to survive as long as possible in pursuit of their dreams. We can never be sure of our judgments of talent; but we can be sure that our funds are being well used if they enable an artist to keep working a little bit longer or make it possible for him to see his work reach its public.

The Opera-Musical Theater Program has, from its inception, emphasized support for the production of music theater works, in the conviction that art is a communication between the creator and interpreter and the audience. We have also emphasized the irreplaceable role of new work in keeping the art form healthy.

Critics might find an irony in this concern for new works in a program which serves, as one of its components, opera—a form often unfairly derided for dully repeating, over and over, the same few dozen masterpieces. Opera in the United States is certainly not now characterized by such repetition. In the last 20 years, as opera companies have sprouted and flourished in almost every American city and town, interest in developing and presenting new works has become the most significant feature of a distinctly American operatic profile. Opera in the United States is now a genuinely American art form, bursting with vitality—reaching sell-out audiences everywhere; nourishing the most talented singers, conductors, directors, and designers to be found anywhere in the world; and continuously investigating fresh approaches to the lyric theater.

At the same time, the musical play or comedy, America's unique contribution to music theater, has grown up. This form deals with the issues and concerns of life as the world approaches the twenty-first century. It is stretching its creative perspective to become a major intellectual and emotional force in our lives. With the attention music theater as a whole is now receiving from the Endowment and other funding sources, a generation of nonprofit institutions is coming into being. They aim both to preserve the best of American musical theater of the last 100 years and to provide the means and structure for the gestation of the musical theater of the future.

How should panelists and staff determine quality, in a pluralistic society and in circumstances in which the need for support will always outstrip the money available? Quality is no longer related to the personal tastes of the wealthy and powerful; the benefits and choices that formerly accrued to a privileged class from the labors of the many are now distributed much more widely. But quality is not democratically determined by popularity. Thus one of the jobs of the National Endowment for the Arts is that of leadership in demonstrating that there is such a thing as quality and that it deserves recognition. Our panels accept this task while remembering that, in our pluralistic democracy, many sorts of competing and complementing activities can all reflect high quality in different ways.

Opera-Musical Theater panelists must continually make choices: between preserving the best of the old and stimulating the new, between making fewer large grants to especially significant projects and more small grants to plant artistic seeds throughout the land, between supporting the artist and supporting the organization that transmits his work to an audience. Since the Endowment operates on the premise that its grants can supply only a small part of the support needed for arts activities and that a partnership must therefore exist between public and private sources of funds, these choices need not be made to the exclusion of alternatives.

There are no unquestionably right answers for all time to the issues discussed above. Our Opera-Musical Theater Program guidelines will therefore change from time to time to reflect the most urgent needs in a field which itself is full of change.

As head of the office that "coordinates" the various Endowment programs, I am frequently asked, "Just what do you do?" Here is the answer. Working under Mary Ann Tighe, Deputy Chairman for Programs, we in Program Coordination are responsible for four major areas: guidelines, regional representatives, international activities, and cross-cutting program explorations of such topics as touring and presenting. They are all quite different, yet all interrelate and all are challenging.

During 1980, we continued the effort to improve program guidelines in a variety of ways. The language was crisper, the approach more straightforward, and the design better than before this effort was begun. Even more fundamentally, program content and substance received more attention. A great deal of work went into making these changes, which involved all the programs. Guidelines remain what has been called "the primary communication link and the definitive expression of program policy to the field." Developing and improving them, which involves countless hours of staff, panel, and Council deliberation and effort, continues to stimulate and educate all of us who are involved in the process. If I were to characterize 1980 with guidelines in mind, I would call it the year of consolidation and clarification—and the year that all the programs paid more attention to minority concerns.

In 1980 the Endowment finally reached its full complement of regional representatives. Twelve men and women now do this important work, living in different regions of the country, providing free services to artists, organizations, and the public. These representatives, most of whom work out of their own homes and have only part-time secretarial help, provide critical links between the Endowment and those around the country who might otherwise think of us as a bloodless, faceless bureaucracy. They travel endlessly in their regions, conduct workshops, answer hundreds of mail and telephone inquiries. Most importantly, they help people all over the country learn about us, and they help us here at the Endowment understand more fully the needs, trends, and unique regional differences that characterize the arts in the United States.

International activities are the most recent arrival in Program Coordination. They were housed here in 1980 to help encourage all the Endowment’s Programs and panels to include international concerns in their overall planning. Our efforts in this area are quite new and exciting, ranging as they do from our advisory work with the International Communication Agency to consultative work with UNESCO to modest funding for international symposia such as 1980’s highly successful “Belgium Today” and artists’ exchanges with the government of Japan. The Endowment’s primary role and focus, of course, is to help American art and artists. But the agency has begun to play an increasingly active leadership and catalytic role here, since the international arena provides important opportunities to share our artists and learn from other nations. We will devote considerable time in the coming year to clarifying our policies and refining our priorities in these new international activities.

The year 1980 also seemed, at least sometimes, to be the year of touring and presenting. An exploration of these related areas occupied considerable attention throughout this past year. A steering committee, composed of representatives from state and regional arts agencies, the Association of College, University, and Community Arts Administrators, and Endowment program directors met regularly to discuss these topics. Throughout the year, too, our program panels have been looking carefully at current and proposed approaches to touring and presenting the arts across the country. The results of some of these discussions have already begun to show up in such program guidelines as Theater and Inter-Arts. And the work goes on.

So “Program Coordination” may sound a bit nebulous, but it certainly doesn't feel that way. Working as we do with all the programs, we are expected to know a great deal about all of them and help them learn from each other. The guidelines we help produce offer information to a good many people. The regional representatives take that information out to the field and bring a lot back to us. This information can, in turn, feed into program deliberations. Our international activities offer new vistas for us all. And cross-cutting program issues constantly arise to challenge our minds and our energies. We expect that the next 15 years will be at least as stimulating as the first 15 have been.

Theater

In discussing the Theater Program at the Endowment, it is tempting to lay before the reader all this year's new programs, new categories, new "pilots" that capture the imagination. But first we need to remember that theater is an ancient and an honorable impulse, and its artists are the priests of that impulse. They can be decked out in new raiments, and they can pretend to be All New, All Improved. But they are not. They are the heirs of Thespis, of Pantalone, of Molière, and of Bernhardt as well as of Sophocles, Shakespeare, Miller, and Medoff.

What is new is the spark they kindle every evening in the audience: The idea that suddenly becomes clear, the tear that creeps from the eye, the laugh that erupts from the gut, the realization of our own mortality. So let us look at theater and the Theater Program from a different angle.

The Endowment began 15 years ago as an attempt to make palpable the federal presence in the arts in America. A noble ambition and, for this country, a daring departure. From the start, there was a recognition that a new breed of theater was emerging in America. Where there had been commercial theater, educational theater, and amateur theater, a different aesthetic was informing a unique expression of that ancient art form. Professional artists were uniting to make theater happen in alternative patterns from that of the commercial, the amateur, or the educational. They were pitching their tents (sometimes literally) not on Broadway or just in New York City, but all over the country. They were essaying quite different repertoires: the classics, the plays of the cutting edge, the forgotten masterpieces.

These pioneer theaters were almost entirely the babies of the Dreamers who found, in the not-for-profit formula, a forum for bringing theater to America. These early daredevils included, amazingly enough, men and women still largely the leaders of their own (and our national) theaters: William Ball, Adrian Hall, Joseph Papp, Gordon Davidson, Zelda Fichandler, as well as the now-departed Nina Vance and Margo Jones. Others created festivals in San Diego, in Ashland (Oregon), in Stratford (Connecticut). As they began to grow and build, a model emerged out in the prairies: Sir Tyrone Guthrie, together with Peter Zeisler and a talented roster of artists, took up the challenge and created out of whole cloth a full-fledged, classical repertory theater in the mode of the Stratford (Canada) and the Royal Shakespeare and the National (then the Old Vic) in England. The Ford Foundation stepped in with daring insight and provided vast sums just at the right moment to let these pioneer theaters sink tap roots in their own regions. The country was startled to find itself dotted with theaters of national and international repute.

Almost simultaneously the "next generation" (usually only a few years younger and less experienced) popped up and was profoundly dissatisfied with what had, almost overnight, become "establishment theater." Alternatives emerged, sometimes in the very cities where the Big Guys were (Minneapolis, Washington, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Chicago, and, of course, New York) and sometimes in cities which had not even thought of theater beyond the annual senior class production at the local high school. A Next Generation of Dreamers was nudging its way into the limelight.

And before we could catalogue and absorb this next generation of theaters, another was squirming and announcing itself from storefronts, abandoned churches, and former movie houses.

America had rediscovered theater. What, around the turn of the century, had been "the road" had died away in the face of radio, "the talkies," and television. But something had gone wrong with the machine-made, machine-fed "drama." Audiences sensed a loss of personal contact, of getting up and going out, of making a ceremony of theater-going. They missed something; or in the popular parlance, they were "alienated" in a world which made less sense than ever before. They needed what Camus has called their "illusions." Theater came along to help fill the need, to respond to the loss, to replenish the dream.
The Theater Program has tried to stabilize, encourage, re-enforce the institutions through which these amazing artists might work their magic. Over the years, the Theater Program defined its territory: the professional, not-for-profit theater. At first largely limited to the larger, more established companies, it eventually divided and subdivided until now our “turf” includes all of the categories listed on the following pages. Of these, the new categories, approved in 1980 and effective for the 1981-1982 performance season, include:

Intermediate Professional Theater Companies, which will support theaters which previously have had to “compete” inequitably either with the largest or the smallest companies.

Fellowships for Playwrights (transferred to the Theater Program from the Literature Program), which will provide funds to enable dramatists to create new work for theaters and audiences.

Residencies for Playwrights (also transferred to Theater from Literature), which will enable theater companies and other organizations to work directly and closely with playwrights of their own choice.

Artistic Associates, which will provide theater companies and mature artist with the benefit of sustained associations with one another.

In addition, three new pilot programs seek to examine ways by which the Theater Program can broaden assistance to the arts of theater and to theater audiences:

Director/Fellows, which brings mid-career directors to residencies in regional non-profit theater companies for a season of work.

Dramaturges, which gives literary and artistic experts residencies with selected companies to extend the theater’s repertoire and to introduce audiences to a broader, more varied kind of production and play.

Script Services, which provides theaters with access to new plays and provides playwrights with access to potential producing theaters.

By and large, our funding is small in every category. In fact, we give less than 4.4 percent to most of our large theaters, in terms of their annual operating budgets; and we provide only 6.1 percent to our small theaters, which have a much more difficult time raising money but which, of course, have much smaller operating budgets. However, the actual sums of money are only relative, because they make possible three distinct things:

- These funds provide recognition by peers, and at a federal level, of the legitimacy, the quality, and the importance of each institution.
- By judiciously expending the funds available, the panels constantly try to encourage exploration of the outer edges of theater and at the same time to encourage theaters to be daring and innovative in their repertoires. If each company had to depend solely on box office revenues, it would be extremely cautious in selecting a season or in daring to present new plays, let alone new playwrights.
- Our funding can be very effective, we know, if the company will use it as leverage in raising other monies from other sources: local and national, private and public.

An overview of the theater today must take note of the fact that the recession is particularly hard on theater. Lumber, electricity, materials all soar at an incredible rate, while sources of revenue are drying up. Box office and seating capacity are finite; if tickets go too high, the audience will perforce vanish; private donors feel the financial pinch and become more reluctant or unable to support companies of artists; and the major foundations seem to be drifting in their emphasis to projects in the physical and social sciences.

Too often, as the crunch presses in on these companies, the artists are the “fall guys”; they work for less and for longer hours to make theater come alive. The Theater Program urgently stresses that the artist must not be the one to bear the brunt financially of bringing art to America. We can best help by constantly reminding the institutions that artists are the heart of the matter and that they must be rendered dignity, salaries, and respect commensurate with the services they provide to the community and the institution. If productions must be cut down, so be it; but if artists must work longer for less money, then both our institutions and our society must be made cognizant of the consequences. In sum, we will continue to put our money on the line to support the institutions in order to make it possible for artists to create excellent theater.

Times will be tough, no question about it. But we suggest that the best of theater will survive the worst of times. For as much as the theater needs its audiences, so does Man need his illusions, his dreams. The living theater is quite irreplaceable, quite indestructible because it is needed. So, Endowment or no, theater will survive. In fact, art will survive. Our monuments, our battles, our papers and our task forces, our committees and our wars, our offices and our pretensions, will all in time vanish. As Shelley wrote in Ozymandias of the monument bearing the boastful legend:

My name is Ozymandias, king of kings:
Look on my works, ye Mighty, and despair!

But Shelley goes on, of that monument:

Nothing besides remains. Round the decay
Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare
The lone and level sands stretch far away.

But Art will remain. It will not only survive, but it will evolve and change and be our final epitaph, our sharing of Eternity. For when the nonsense is all stripped away, a poem, a play, a bit of statue, a space will be our link with Time beyond our reckoning.

*Contract: PG = Program Funds; TP = Treasury Funds
We had rivers of proposals and applications come through again this year. One of the impressive things that we have been noticing is the diversity of modes of artmaking. Artists are working in new mediums that they have invented themselves; some are seriously working with such subjects as ecological and social structures. Today artists are forcing us to redefine traditional disciplines and even to revise our preconceptions of what art is.

Artists who focus on art for and of public places are no exception. The past year has shown us how differently they can approach public projects. The Art Commission of King County, Washington, for example, invited artists to find ways of transforming exhausted strip-mining sites. That may sound like an odd assignment to give to artists, but it isn't when you consider how artists are naturally involved in transformation. To render a scar in the landscape into a wonderful place to be is a perfect job for some artists. Alan Sonfist, for example, has developed ways of restoring vegetation to a city. He brings in a research team that finds out what the landscape looked like hundreds of years ago before the city was there. He reintroduces those grasses, those shrubs, those trees, so that you have a city block in lower Manhattan with the old landscape. It's a long way from the days when we thought of a public artwork as a statue of a prominent citizen on horseback or an arty shape designed with no concern for where it would appear.

In past years we've seen some regrettable results when the artwork is an afterthought, commissioned and installed after all else is completed. A sculpture in that situation often ends up looking as though it were stuck on where it didn't belong. Recently, the Visual Arts Program has had some success in bringing architects and artists together while a project is still being planned. We're beginning to see some sensational results from this kind of collaboration.

Commissions for art in an architectural context may involve not only sculptors and painters but also craftsmen. Such collaboration used to be common practice: The craftwork at Timberline Lodge or the Library of Congress is integral to those buildings. Commissions to craftsmen this past year have included the flooring of a plaza and wrought ironwork in the plaza furniture. The new category of Building Arts encourages research leading to the design of components for buildings.

Building Arts also encourages research leading to the building of one-of-a-kind houses for personal use. Especially on the West Coast and in the Southwest, large numbers of artists are moving to rural areas, buying land in the wilderness and building on it. They are hand-building their own houses and doing it with ingenuity and a great sense of purpose. The results are frequently quite beautiful and closely attuned to the land and the climate. Instead of building a house that might be suitable anywhere and then hooking up their energy sources, they are starting with their energy sources. A sculptor in New Mexico, for example, designed his own hydro-electric system to tap a stream on his property and then built his house around it. Considering the increasing scarcity of energy sources and materials, such demonstrations of alternatives are timely and worth encouraging.

Questions of supply and survival worry photographers as well. The days of silver printing seem to be numbered. With the invention of new processes and alternatives to silver, photographic artists will undoubtedly surprise us with new imagery. Artists are that resourceful.

Again this year, the Visual Arts Program has delighted in helping increase the number of first-rate photography exhibitions and publishing activities throughout the country. Public awareness of photographic art has grown rapidly; the increase in shows and sales reflects it. And yet there's reason to doubt that the nature of photographic art is understood. People tend to think of it in terms of painting, as though it were possible to draw analogies between two such inherently different disciplines. For example, Critics look for periods of Abstract Expressionism and Formalism to appear. Again, the difficulty can be traced back to faulty preconceptions which get in the way of seeing. If we can trust artists to be our eyes, we'll find that they can free us from outlived notions of what a discipline is like or of the nature of art itself. Our artists can even bring us revelations of the world, providing we let them.

Deputy Chairman's Statement

During the past few years the Arts Endowment has directed its efforts increasingly toward two principal goals. The first is to better support excellence in the arts' many manifestations across the country. Through its programs, the Endowment has worked at its primary labor to identify and help support talent and quality in the arts. To that end, the peer review system was strengthened and the National Council on the Arts asked to participate in the affairs of the Endowment to a greater extent than at any time since its very first years.

The second goal is to galvanize the collective wisdom of the National Council, the chairman and deputies, the program directors and panels into a coherent vision of the agency's role in the future of arts support in this country. As the Endowment grows, so does the need and the responsibility to be clear about what it does so well on a day-to-day basis and, if possible, eloquent about what it sets out to do. This task is not an easy one. Nor should it be. The 15 years during which the Endowment matured were marked by an enormous and restless growth in the arts and by an even wider national recognition. That growth is part of a major, dynamic change in the basic social fabric of America whereby the quality of life and the richness of our culture have taken on an unexpected importance.

In such circumstances, an agency of government charged by law to develop "a national policy in support of the arts" could easily find itself adrift in perilous waters unless it possessed a firm, well-grounded sense of its mission. Winston Churchill said, "Those who are possessed of a definite body of doctrine and of deeply rooted convictions upon it will be in a much better position to deal with the shifts and surprises of daily affairs." Fortunately, the Endowment began in 1966 with a statement of purpose in its basic governing statute which has been reaffirmed, as it has in 1980, each time the law has come before Congress for reauthorization.

I don't have space to quote the law's complete Declaration of Purpose, but a portion will suffice: "that the world leadership which has come to the United States cannot rest solely upon superior power, wealth, and technology, but must be solidly founded upon worldwide respect and admiration for the nation's high qualities as a leader in the realm of ideas and of the spirit."

Those in public and private life who were the driving force behind the drafting of this law and the establishment of the Endowment shared a healthy concern about creating an agency that would assume a role not intended for it. Those men and women revered quality and competition, and the notion that the arts would develop organically from the whole of American life, not simply in response to the political exigencies of the moment. That is why they wisely called for the development of a "national policy in support of the arts," rather than a national arts policy.

And that is why our current Chairman asked the National Council on the Arts and its Committee on Policy and Planning, which he created, to develop a long-range vision for Endowment support of the arts. The charge was first to draft a statement of mission against which future plans could be evaluated, keeping in mind the basic principles on which the Endowment was founded. In 1978 the Policy and Planning Committee drafted and the Council adopted a statement which says: "The goal of the Endowment is the fostering of professional excellence of the arts in America, to nurture and sustain them, and equally to help create a climate in which they may flourish so they may be experienced and enjoyed by the widest possible public." This statement also described five activities the Endowment should encourage through its support: individual creativity; institutional creativity; preservation of our living artistic heritage; making the arts available; and, finally, leadership and advocacy on behalf of the arts.

As a government agency charged with supporting the arts without dominating them, the Endowment must assume a catalytic role. The federal, state, and local government agencies that assist the arts, plus many private organizations and individuals as well as businesses and corporations—these make up a lattice work of interrelationships upon which the arts must and should continue to depend. The balance, which I believe the Endowment must always seek to strike, is between support that makes a difference and support that overwhelms.

Of equal concern is the need to balance theory and practice. As we develop our vision, we must preserve those time-tested practices, such as National Council and peer panel review, which make it possible to do as we say we do. Peer review is where theory and practice come together in creative decision-making. The willingness of the members of the National Council to assume wider responsibilities and take time to work with the Endowment has provided guidance and insight where a bewildering array of forces might otherwise have confounded our best efforts to clarify our activities and foresee our future with confidence.

As a result, during the past two-and-a-half years, improvements in our budget have meant not simply more grants, but better planning. As the National Council has become more active, its members help formulate long-range and short-range planning, determine annual budget priorities, set policy with the state art agencies, and decide upon challenge grant awards.

Government should never be an end in itself. It is, and must be, a means by which commonly agreed-upon goals are sought. And in working toward these ends, it must be responsive to the needs it is perceived to serve.

As a nation, we are undergoing a broad-based reconsideration of government’s role—internal and external. This assessment extends to many important aspects of our national life: to our economy, to the resources necessary to maintain the strength and character of our society, and to a heightened interest in the quality of our cultural life. In like fashion, the Endowment, both internally and externally, is engaged upon an intense period of examination, wholly appropriate for an agency of government, but especially important for one which works to support the arts. Development, change, evolution are critical aspects of the creative impulse.

I think that I reflect the opinion of the National Council and the staff when I say that we are optimistic for the arts, for America’s artists, and for our cultural organizations throughout the country. The Endowment is an unique enterprise, one joined by all of the 50 states, seeking to fulfill the responsibilities set forth in its original mandate with a continuing sensitivity to excellence and with a clear recognition that it is just one organization among many dedicated to enhancing opportunity for the arts.

John Ruskin said: “Great nations write their autobiography in three manuscripts: the book of their deeds, the book of their words, and the book of their art. Not one of these books can be understood unless we read the two others, but of the three the only trustworthy one is the last.” My reason for confidence about the arts rests on the conviction that over the past two decades our country began that third manuscript and that the drafting has been feverish. The vitality and energy of our diverse land is opening a broad new channel for expression through the arts.

This exhibition is made possible, in part, with public funds from the New York State Council on the Arts. The exhibition is also supported by contributions from individuals, corporations, and foundations.
Challenge Grants

As American cultural institutions reach out to new audiences and struggle with the effects of inflation, their income must increase and their management systems must become more sophisticated. In 1976 Congress authorized the Challenge Grant Program as a long-term way of helping arts organizations cope with these new financial realities.

The reasoning behind the Program recalls an ancient Chinese proverb that goes: "If you give a man a fish, you feed his family today, but if you teach him how to fish, you feed his family every day." Grants from the Endowment's discipline Programs help arts groups stay alive from year to year, but are seldom large enough to lift the organization up to a new level of financial and artistic health. A challenge grant, however, means much more to the recipient than the grant money itself. By encouraging a quantum leap in private contributions and by focusing attention on administrative techniques, particularly long-range planning, the Challenge Grant Program helps build arts institutions for the years ahead.

From 1977 to 1980, the Endowment awarded 281 challenge grants to 335 institutions; these grantees have matched their total of $83,385,500 in federal funding with nearly $500 million in private contributions.

Whether an applicant organization receives a challenge grant depends upon evaluation of both its artistic and management quality. Since the Program's initial year, challenge applications have been reviewed annually by panels convened by the Endowment's discipline Programs; a management and consulting firm on contract to the Endowment; a special committee of the National Council on the Arts, composed in 1980 of Willard Boyd, Norman Champ, J.C. Dickinson, Bernard Lopez, Franklin Schaffner, Dolores Wharton, Jessie Woods, and Rosalind Wyman; the full Council; and the Chairman of the Arts Endowment, who approves the final grant awards. This multi-level review assesses the quality of each applicant's administrative structure, its ability to match a grant, the potential long-range benefits of the three-year challenge grant campaign, and the artistic caliber of its program.

Under this system in 1980, grants went to 120 culturally and geographically diverse institutions. Notable results from our 1980 grantees so far include:

- California Institute of the Arts in Valencia—Preparing the fund-raising files for the challenge campaign enabled the school, one of nine arts training institutions to receive a grant in this round, to change over to a computer system that will increase speed and accuracy in handling development data.
- Chicago Educational Television Association/WTTW—The increased funds raised in the campaign helped the station buy equipment to increase its arts programming.
- Cleveland Consortium for the Performing Arts—A Cleveland Foundation study brought together seven arts groups, ranging from the Cleveland Ballet to Karamu House, in a joint fund-raising campaign; the study also resulted in improved management techniques and a five-year financial plan for each organization.
- Walters Art Gallery in Baltimore—A reorganized development staff and beefed-up exhibition schedule meant increases of 43 percent in membership, 42 percent in attendance, and 23 percent in annual giving.
- Yaddo in Saratoga Springs, New York—This artists' colony, founded in 1926, launched the largest fund-raising campaign in its history. As these examples make clear, our primary concern is that the grant not only contribute to the financial stability of the institution but also help it develop and refine its administrative side. The written evaluations prepared by our management consulting firm are available to applicants; these often lead to further self-study and constructive changes in procedures, record-keeping, and board structure. Many applicants tell us that the application process itself—especially the need to prepare a five-year plan—focuses attention on long-range financial planning as a continuous management tool.

receive a challenge grant—or is ready for one—but believing that all cultural institutions might profit from an account of our grantees' experiences, we published The Challenge Grant Experience: Planning, Development, and Fund-raising last year. This book's short case histories graphically illustrate some successful efforts, and problems, in the areas of long-range planning, development, public relations, boards of trustees, and fund-raising. Distributed free of charge, the book, we hope, will serve as a source of ideas for many nonprofit organizations, particularly arts institutions of all sizes in all artistic disciplines. In addition, we believe it will document for major contributors—especially foundations and corporations which have taken an active part in the Challenge Grant Program—the management and development techniques currently employed by arts institutions.

To determine current attitudes about the possibility of awarding previous grantees a second challenge grant, we also conducted a survey of grantees, rejectees, and Endowment program directors. We plan to consider such issues as the effect of inflation and the economy on the grants, the continuing process necessary for an arts group to achieve long-term financial stability, the need for technical assistance, and the possibility of counting earned income toward the matching requirements. As we seek in the coming year to develop a program that answers the prevalent financial and administrative needs of our outstanding cultural institutions, this discussion of some form of second-time challenge grants will continue.

Finally, we have recognized a gap in the Challenge Grant Program; the Endowment's insistence on a high degree of managerial competence and fund-raising capability has screened out many organizations of high artistic quality that could benefit enormously from a challenge grant. As a result, we have begun a two-phase pilot Advancement Grant Program to serve these organizations. Since most are in an emerging stage of development where the excellence of their programs has outstripped their administrative capabilities, the first phase would provide grantees with special consultants in public relations, management, marketing, fund-raising, and similar fields. Upon successful completion of the first phase, they would be eligible to receive a special form of challenge grant requiring the usual three-to-one match, but allowing both contributed and earned income to count toward that match.

As the final chapter of The Challenge Grant Experience states: "Like all new endeavors, the Challenge Grant Program has found that there is room for improvement." Our continual dialogue with applicants, grantees, corporations and foundations, and arts administrators helps us define the areas that need increased attention. In the coming year we hope the development of these new programs will answer some of the institutional needs of arts organizations. Additional publications in particular might help fill the need for management assistance. The important point is that the Endowment and arts institutions will continue to work together in identifying problem areas and sharing their successes and failures.

To assist the Endowment and the Council by developing new information on the needs and conditions of the arts field. The division consults with the Endowment programs, providing evaluations from research and program analyses to assist in the development of policy and the improvement of guidelines for funding. The Research Division also aids local and national organizations, both public and private, by furnishing data conclusions and recommendations from research projects. The division continues to maintain communication with organizations engaged in arts-related research.

PERCEIVING MODERN SCULPTURE
Selections for the Sighted and Non-Sighted

Grey Art Gallery and Study Center, New York University
July 8-August 22, 1980
Special Constituencies

Last year the Arts Endowment gave a $10,000 demonstration grant to the Mark Taper Forum to help the Los Angeles theater make its productions more inviting to deaf people. As a result of that grant, the theater began presenting two performances of each play with sign language interpreters; hired a deaf staff member and offered classes in signing to the rest of the staff; and installed a special telephone device (a TTY machine) that enables the deaf to phone for reservations. Soon the Taper had 350 new subscribers.

More important, according to Artistic Director Gordon Davidson, is that this consciousness-raising process made the artistic staff quite receptive to a new play by Mark Medoff entitled Children of a Lesser God—the story of a romantic relationship between a deaf woman and a hearing man, told in both signed and spoken dialogue. When the play was taken to Broadway, the Taper insisted that the commercial producers install a TTY machine and teach box-office personnel some sign language. The play received three Tony awards; Phyllis Frelich was named “Best Actress”—the first time a deaf performing artist has received this kind of recognition.

This is a particularly fine model because of its extraordinary catalytic effect; it demonstrates how becoming involved with “special constituencies”—handicapped individuals, older persons, veterans, those institutionalized in hospitals or prisons—can expand our ideas of art.

To make the arts more accessible to these groups, both as participants and audiences, the Endowment’s Office for Special Constituencies, established in 1976, works closely with the Endowment’s discipline Programs, their grantees, state and community arts agencies, and other federal agencies. Our advocacy efforts take myriad forms, some of them rather subtle. For example, we participated in the House of Representatives’ Subcommittee on Aging hearings held on February 7, 1980. The testimony delivered—on how arts programs can contribute to the mental and physical well-being of the aging and on the contributions older artists make to the arts—led the subcommittee to recommend that “arts and cultural services” be included in funding provisions for the Older Americans Act. This action would be a landmark, making it possible for state and local agencies for the aging to hire more professional artists.

It’s important to remember that by December 1981, when the planned White House Conference on Aging takes place, 24 million Americans will be over 65 years of age. At the previous White House Conference in 1971, such pressing issues as housing and health needs dominated the discussions. To make sure that cultural activities are on the agenda this time, we’ve signed a cooperative agreement with the Humanities Endowment, the Administration on Aging, and the White House Conference on Aging. In essence, the four agencies will cooperate in supporting a policy conference or symposium (to be held early in 1981) which will bring together experts on the arts, the humanities, and the aging.

Two other interagency agreements have borne fruit in the last year. In 1976 we joined with the U. S. Bureau of Prisons to establish artist-in-residence programs. Thus far 17 prisons have brought in professional artists to tap their inmates’ creativity, and local sources have assumed the funding for 13 of these programs.

Under a similar agreement with the Veterans Administration (VA) signed in September 1979, the Hines Medical Center in Illinois set up a comprehensive visual arts program for its patients. The VA has been so pleased with this first residency that it plans to hire the artist as part of its permanent staff. We have been helping the VA work out a civil service procedure under which the artists would be selected by a panel of local artists, arts administrators, and the hospital’s staff.

As part of the same agreement, the VA also set aside one-half of one percent of its hospital construction costs for public artworks. To date, the Endowment’s Visual Arts Program has convened panels at 12 sites to select the artists, and 10 works have been commissioned.

The largest part of our constituency, of course,
Setting the Stage
For the Years Ahead

The 1981 White House Conference On Aging is the 35 million Americans classified as handicapped in some way. In May 1979 the Arts Endowment became the third federal agency to publish its regulations for implementing Section 504 of the 1973 Rehabilitation Act, the law requiring federal grantees and contractors to make at least part of their programs accessible to handicapped individuals. One of the chief vehicles for encouraging voluntary compliance with these regulations is a contract with the National Access Center, formerly named the Arts and Special Constituencies Project. Working through the state arts agencies, this organization sensitizes arts administrators to the accessibility issue and offers technical assistance in the form of seminars, publications, and slide presentations. Largely as a result of these efforts, all but three states have now hired their own 504 coordinators.

In addition, cultural institutions across the country have created advisory committees of handicapped people, to evaluate their programs and educate their staffs. For example, the 504 coordinator at the Museum of Modern Art in New York City, after consulting with the advisory committee, used the Picasso exhibition as an opportunity to test ways of making the visual arts accessible to visually impaired visitors. The museum produced a large-type guide to the exhibition as well as a braille transcript for the blind, and incorporated this material into the standard audio tour. It also designed a tactile tour of its sculpture collection and a similar catalogue in braille and large type.

I believe the heart of our program lies in the grants for model demonstration projects, which are funded through the Endowment's regular programs. In 1980 we supported 27 such projects totaling $300,000, a considerable increase over the previous year's budget of $200,000. Each of these grants offers ample material for an essay in itself, but just a few of the more interesting include:

- The O'Neill Theater Center in Connecticut, which held a conference to train sign interpreters in the technique of interpreting theatrical presentations for deaf audiences.
- The Yale School of Architecture, which is offering courses on how to design and adapt cultural facilities for handicapped persons.
- The Kansas Arts Commission, which is touring a tactile arts exhibit, “Touch and See,” in conjunction with workshops conducted by a visually impaired consultant for one month in each community.

None of these projects is large or very expensive. Yet each one brings us closer to the goal first endorsed by the National Council on the Arts in 1973: “No citizen, regardless of physical and mental conditions and abilities, age, or living environment should be deprived of the beauty and insight into the human experience that only the arts can impart.”

Model Projects

The following model projects demonstrate ways to make the arts accessible to handicapped, older Americans, and institutionalized populations both as audiences and as participants. Organizations are encouraged to make special constituencies part of their regular programming, rather than to develop separate programs that segregate them. A total of $253,386 in program funds supported the model projects of which $245,386 was transferred from the Office of Special Constituencies to other Endowment programs as indicated.

Partnership Coordination
State Programs

Henry E. Putsch
Executive Director, Office for Partnership
As Fiscal 1980 began, the Artists-in-Schools Program (AIS) stood on the threshold of change. Although the Program had proved itself in its ten years of existence as one of the Arts Endowment's most successful and innovative projects, there was uncertainty about its future. A renewed, forward-looking policy was needed, and in August 1979 the National Council on the Arts approved a proposal to assess the impact and potential of the AIS experience and develop a plan for the future—a plan by which, in accordance with National Council policy, the Program would move "beyond its demonstration phase to a truly national program."

In February 1980, the National Council approved a blueprint for this process that included appointing a 39-member national advisory committee, holding six regional and two national meetings, requesting oral and written testimony from a wide spectrum of individuals, and developing a plan based on the study.

The advisory committee carefully examined the existing program, outlined an ideal program, analyzed impediments to that ideal, and raised the critical issues. The committee's views were then examined, tested, reinforced, or altered by artists, educators, administrators, and citizens from every state at the six regional meetings held in Washington, D.C., Chicago, Denver, San Francisco, Atlanta, and Boston. Artists talked about how they had grown as artists through the program. Students and teachers spoke of the enrichment of their educational environment and their lives by the program. Community leaders emphasized how entire communities had benefited from artists' residencies. Art administrators believed that the successes of school residencies could equally enhance other educational settings. At the same time, certain concerns were consistently voiced: Simply put, an improved program required a broader funding base, more support services, flexibility in responding to needs, and better evaluation and documentation for program development and advocacy.

We collected, in all, 60,000 pieces of written and oral data from over 1,200 individuals. Based on this data, the advisory committee and the AIS panel recommended a redefined program consisting of three parts:

- First, a system of grants to state arts agencies for residencies that would place practicing artists of professional excellence not only in schools, but in a wide range of educational programs in communities, cultural institutions, colleges and universities, and social organizations.
- Second, a means for the Endowment to respond directly to special projects that serve as models in which the arts and artists strengthen a wide range of learning environments.
- Third, technical services to assist in the growth and development of arts in education.

Because of its broader scope, philosophy, processes, and purposes, the revised Program was entitled Artists in Education.

Approved by the National Council in August 1980, the Artists in Education Program not only reaffirms the Endowment's long-standing recognition that the arts community has a valued and valuable role in education. It also reflects the Endowment's awareness that arts education, audience development, artist training, and career development occur in a wide variety of learning environments for a significant portion of the American population. In addition, the Program provides for appropriate interaction among federal, state, and local government agencies and private organizations in their arts and education efforts.

And so in fiscal 1980 the Artists-in-Schools Program evolved into the Artists in Education Program. The Program exits the year broadened in vision, renewed in vitality, heightened in value, and enriched by a sense of mutual trust and a commitment to cooperation on the part of agencies and individuals at every level. The planning process resulted in more than a new program. It established a climate for respect and advancement in the years ahead.

ARTS WEEK
Partnership Coordination

While pleading for a part in a show, one of the characters in A Chorus Line sings plaintively, “God, I’m a dancer. A dancer dances!” Would that it were that simple and straightforward to explain Partnership Coordination.

In the spring of 1979, the Chairman authorized the reorganization of the Office of Federal-State Partnership; through that restructuring, the Partnership Coordination Program was born. Its charge was to “foster collaborative, mutually supportive working relationships between the Endowment and other federal arts support programs, state, regional and local public arts agencies, and professional arts organizations.” The Program is challenged to find new ways in which federal, state, and local government agencies can work together more efficiently to serve their mutual constituencies. Implied is a new perspective on the traditional grantee/grantor relationship of the Endowment to the state arts agencies and a recognition that each is an important collaborator in the other’s work: partners not just in name, but in practice in support of the arts. We are a connecting link among the various parts of the public arts support networks—a network made up of Endowment programs, state and local arts agencies, and regional consortia, a network which is still nascent and uncertain, but a network which is growing.

As in any public enterprise, as state and federal arts agencies gain success in their efforts, they come under increasing public scrutiny. More and more people—artists and audiences alike—want not only more money but also greater access to decision-making. With stakes larger now than ever before in the relatively short history of public arts support, the staffs, panels, and board members responsible for weighing and integrating the sometimes conflicting needs of their various constituencies often find themselves breaking new ground without the benefit of models or mentors. In its initial year, Partnership Coordination tried to help shed light on this process, to document and disseminate what has been learned, and to encourage cooperation among the member groups of the arts support network.

We inherited some activities which were in progress when our Program began; others reflected what the Program judged to be the needs of the field. Some work was theoretical; most was concrete and quantifiable. At times we addressed immediate demands; at others, we took the long view and hoped that our grandchildren would thank us for it.

The Program’s panel was composed of representatives of state and regional agencies, Endowment Programs, and arts disciplines; together, they provided a wide range of opinion and perspective. As a rule, the Program did not award grants on a competitive basis. Rather, it solicited proposals from organizations and individuals to carry out activities that were based on ideas that the panel brought from the field.

Partnership Coordination supported projects such as the National Information Systems Project which, in its second year, began to establish a uniform base of information through a nationally organized system within state arts agencies and the Endowment. The staff also implemented Partnership Consultations, a project in which artists and administrators from across the country spent time in four pilot states to talk with artists, audiences, managers, educators, politicians, community leaders, volunteers, grantees, non-grantees, and state arts agency staff and board members to assess the effect of public funding of the arts. The Program funded such services as the final year of the National Assembly of State Arts Agencies’ pilot planning project in selected states, and provided technical assistance to local arts agencies through the National Assembly of Community Arts Agencies.

The Program also:
• Asked a non-governmental organization to investigate and analyze the participation of racial minorities in public arts agencies so that it would have a basis for designing activities to strengthen that involvement and to encourage cultural pluralism.
- Commissioned a study by four individuals on the current and future status of government support of the arts at all levels for the National Partnership Meeting, a major convocation of leaders in the arts field held in June.
- Awarded grants for exemplary projects to include the handicapped in state and local arts activities.
- Joined our funds with those of the Crafts Division of the Visual Arts Program to support a series of hearings around the country to survey the needs of the American crafts community.

Our many activities were undertaken in cooperation with other agencies or programs and all arose from an often-voiced need for more accurate and timely information and more comfortable and productive relationships between the Endowment and state arts agencies—in short, for greater coordination among the parts so that the arts support network, as a whole, would be viable and strong.

Make Lasting Impressions

1980 is awakening art awareness.
State Programs

The authors of the law that established the Arts Endowment knew that a single agency, based in Washington, could not address all the diverse cultural needs of the vast collection of states and territories that make up the United States. Therefore, they provided that no less than 20 percent of the new agency's annual program budget would go to the states for support of their own arts activities.

In fiscal 1980, State Programs—the Endowment office that carries out this Congressional mandate—awarded grants totaling $19.3 million to 56 state and territorial arts agencies. While Endowment funding clearly plays a significant role, direct appropriations from state legislatures, which added up to $98.6 million in 1980, have become the backbone of state arts support.

State Programs also awards grants to such regional groups of state arts agencies as the Southern Arts Federation, the Western States Arts Foundation, and the Mid-America Arts Alliance. These are private, nonprofit organizations created by the states to carry out programs, like touring, and provide services that work best on a multi-state basis. Last year the eight regional arts organizations received nearly $2.8 million in Endowment funding as well as financial support from their member state agencies and, for some, funding from the private sector.

Over the past 15 years state arts agencies and regional groups have supported more than 50,000 arts projects and activities with the help of Endowment funds. Recently State Programs funding has been used for: Native American cultural festivals and workshops in Alaska; general operations of the Tyrone Guthrie Theater in Minneapolis; teaching residencies by Merce Cunningham's dance company in Seattle and Tacoma; professional management assistance for the Wheeling (West Virginia) Symphony; general operations of the Cincinnati Art Museum; jazz festivals and workshops in Kansas; touring by the Negro Ensemble Company in the Southeast; ticket subsidies for older audiences in North Dakota; touring by the Alvin Alley Repertory Ensemble in the West; a state crafts center at Frog Hollow, Vermont; the commissioning of public sculptures in Indiana; a touring exhibition of 60 works by Georgia O'Keeffe in the Midwest; poetry residencies in rural libraries in Kentucky; professional crafts instruction for low-income residents of Macon County, North Carolina; and the Just Us Theater Company's development of black audiences in Atlanta through presentation of works by black playwrights.

The crucial point to remember about State Programs funds is that the state and regional agencies, not the Endowment, determine how they will be used. One state may opt for supporting arts institutions, while another agency might use the major part of its State Programs grant to support visual and performing arts touring. A third state may emphasize support for individual artists or community arts activities. In each case the Endowment funding goes to satisfy local needs.

To ensure accountability for these federal dollars, however, the procedures by which state arts agencies and regional groups set priorities, make decisions, and carry out programs must address a set of criteria worked out by the State Programs Panel. Unlike the panels in most Endowment Programs, our panel judges a process, not an artistic product. Among the criteria each state plan must meet are: effective planning, involvement of minorities and special constituencies, fair decision-making, public access to programs, and adequate provisions for evaluation and reporting. Our panel and staff devote much time and energy to intensive review of the basic plans submitted by the state and regional agencies. The panel does not recommend approval of funding until a state sends in a plan that satisfactorily addresses the criteria.

The years 1977, 1978, and 1979 were times of reassessment and transition for State Programs. During these years we made significant progress in developing a more efficient and responsive grant-making relationship with state arts agencies and regional groups. In 1980 we undertook to consolidate these gains by clarifying and simplifying our goals, funding criteria, and program categories, and by improving the methods under which funds are apportioned among the states and regions.

The law prescribes that 15 percent of the Endowment's total program funds be divided equally among the states. Under policies adopted in 1980, an additional 5 percent of the agency's program funds will be apportioned as follows: 2.5 percent divided among the states chiefly on the basis of state population size, and the remaining 2.5 percent made available in equal amounts per state for support of regional group activities. The State Programs Panel recommended these policies after careful examination of the potential impact of a variety of suggested funding methods and after extensive consultation with the states and regions.

State Programs has at last emerged from a period of reassessment and transition with a clearer understanding of its role and with more efficient grant-making procedures. Although we anticipate no major changes in the near future, our staff and advisory panel will continue to review and evaluate our grant-making procedures. We also plan to seek ways to help state arts agencies and regional groups strengthen their programs and present more detailed reporting on the ways in which State Programs dollars foster the arts.
